INFORMATION ON COAT-OF-ARMS

The coat-of-arms, reproduced here, was made available originally by The Bortner Association of York County, Pennsylvania. It was reported to have been obtained from the Berlin Museum by Francis Bortner of Maple Shade, New Jersey, a descendant of George Bortner of York County, while he was stationed in West Germany with the U. S. Army in Europe.

The information reported to have been obtained with it, stated that Hans Bortner and his sons, Hans and Paul, received authority from the German Emperor, Frederick III, to display this coat-of-arms. It was reported that the authority was given in Neustadt on November 11, 1454.

There was a city of Neustadt in the Palatinate. Perhaps the authority for the coat-of-arms was given there. Or perhaps the authority was actually given in the city of "Wiener (Viennese) Neustadt", in which Frederick III had a palace; that city is about 30 miles south of Vienna, Austria.

Obviously, Hans Bortner and his two sons were knights (Ritters). Probably they were of the lowest order of nobles; that is, Hans Bortner had no title, such as Baron, or the report from the record in the Berlin Museum would have so stated. They might have been professional soldiers in the service of a German prince. Perhaps, Hans Bortner owned a small landed estate, as a subject of a prince, in order to support him and his family - - perhaps 150 or 200 acres. If they were landless professional soldiers, when knighthood became obsolete, about the year 1500, they (or their descendants) might have been compelled to revert to peasantry (tenant farmers) in order to make a living (probably free peasants). See history of Germany for background.

The fact that the coat-of-arms is composed of halves of two different coats-of-arms indicates, according to the standard practices of heraldry, that the left half (on the reader's right side) belonged to the family of Hans Bortner's wife; the right half (on the reader's left side) to Hans Bortner himself.

It is unknown whether Hans Bortner was an ancestor of Balthaser Bortner and his descendants in America, named Bordner and Burtner, as well as Bortner. There is a high probability that he was not, considering the number of persons by that name who must have been living in Germany at that time, even though they may have been related. However, this apparently authentic coat-of-arms is probably as near to a bona-fide coat-of-arms as will ever be found for Balthaser Bortner and his descendants.

FOREWORD

My interest in the history of the Bordner family began as curiosity concerning my own lineage. My grandfather, who I admired and respected, was left an orphan in Western New York State when he was about three years old. While he knew his father's and mother's names and that they were Pennsylvania Dutch, he did not know much else about them. Late in life I undertook to solve this mystery by research.

Eventually I established my Bordner-Bortner lineage back to our mutual immigrant ancestor, Balser Bortner. In the process I examined records for all of the Bordner and Bortner families for the first four generations. By practical experience I became an amateur genealogist. I found genealogical research interesting.

It seemed to me that every family should have a published genealogy which would enable any interested member, presently living or to be born in the future, to find his or her family tree and learn something about his or her heritage. This should be a source of inspiration for many. Nobody had undertaken this task for the entire family, but The Bortner Association had published a genealogy in 1949 for one large branch of the family, "George Bortner of Codorus Township, York County, Pennsylvania, and his descendants". My retirement from Government service in 1963 gave me the time to use my acquired skill in genealogical research to prepare a genealogy for the rest of the family. And so I undertook the task, presumably for the Bordner family.

In the Summer of 1965, Mr. Clare S. Burtner of Butler, Pennsylvania, wrote to me, after hearing of my work, giving evidence of the descent of the Burtners of Western Pennsylvania from our common immigrant ancestor, Balser Bortner. Whereupon I extended the project to include the Burtners.

So here is the genealogy for the Bordners and the Burtners and their Bortner ancestors in America. All of the descendants of Balser Bortner in America who have carried the names, Bordner and Burtner, have been included in the registers of names, so far as I have been able to ascertain. There are certainly a few omissions, and there is an absence of data for a few, and some probable errors, for which I am sorry. I have done my best, within practical limits of time and expense.

This genealogy does not list the thousands of descendants of Bordner and Burtner daughters. Their names, of course, were changed when they married, and their descendants ought to be listed in other genealogies under their respective family names. It would have been impracticable to trace them for this work and meet the desired goal of completeness.

This genealogy does not include the descendants of George Bortner of York County, Pennsylvania, except in the few cases of ancestors of Bortners who changed their name to Burtner and Bordner. The previously-mentioned work of The Bortner Association is supposed to list all other Bortner family names. Between that work and this, all of the descendants of Balser Bortner in America who have carried the family name in any form should be listed.

Historical and background information has been added, which will be of interest to some.

Grateful acknowledgment is made for valuable assistance rendered by many. Those who have made exceptional contributions are mentioned in the section, "Research methods and sources of data".

This work is dedicated, as a memorial, to the entire family, living and dead and yet to be born, including wives and husbands from other families.

FAMILY HISTORY IN PENNSYLVANIA

Balthaser Bortner, immigrant, and his family

Balthaser Bortner arrived in Philadelphia with his family in September, 1732 on the ship, "Adventure", from Rotterdam, Holland. They had probably started from their home in the Upper Rhine River Valley in the previous Spring. The voyage down the Rhine by barge took five or six weeks; the ocean voyage was longer. And there were delays in waiting for a ship at Rotterdam, and after taking the ship there was a stopover at Cowes on the Isle of Wight in the English Channel. Such voyages involved much suffering - - bad food and water, overcrowding, coldness, wetness, stench, and much sickness and disease. Some died. Survivors had to be strong and healthy as well as courageous.

Fortunately there is an authentic record in the Pennsylvania Archives of how Balthaser Bortner spelled his name - - the Oaths of Allegiance taken on September 23, 1732 by all of the family heads of the passengers on the ship, "Adventure". On the following page is a reproduction of page 74 from Volume 2 of "Pennsylvania German Pioneers", by Strassburger and Hinke, published by The Pennsylvania German Society, showing facsimile signatures from the original Oaths of Allegiance. Of course, these signatures are written in German script of the period. That book also listed Hinke's expert reading of the signatures; our ancestor's signature (indicated by an arrow) was stated to be written "Balser Bortner". "Balser" was a contraction often made by Germans for the biblical name "Balthaser". (English: Balthasar or Balthazar. Hebraic: Belshazzar.) Balthaser was the name of one of the three wise men in the bible legend of the birth of Christ in Bethlehem.

Misspellings on passenger-lists of European immigrants of that time were common. English-speaking people had great difficulty with German names, but there were also errors due to carelessness.

The given name of Mrs. Balser Bortner (Bortnerin in German) was actually "Maria Elisabetha" (Mary Elizabeth in English). "Merreles" is not a true name, either in German or English - - that was a crude contraction. There is no record of her maiden family-name.

In a biography of certain descendants of Jacob Bortner, a History of Berks County, Pennsylvania, states erroneously that there were two immigrant daughters named "Hannah" and "Mela". The passenger-list shows that both names applied to one daughter. However, there is no known name "Mela", either in German or English. Research indicates that her true name was probably "Anna Maria Barbara".

All of the 145 passengers on the "Adventure" were called "Palatines" in the minutes of the Provincial Council, which recorded the qualification of the ship's passengers for entry into the Colony. Only citizens of the Palatinate were properly called "Palatines", but that term was applied in Pennsylvania at that time to all German-speaking immigrants. While the Bortners, like the great majority of German immigrants of that time, probably came from the Palatinate, they may have come, as some did, from one of the other German States in the Upper Rhine Valley - - Hesse, Alsace, Baden, Wurttemberg, Bavaria, or Switzerland. Besides our general information on the sources of German immigration at that time, we know the following specific facts about the Bortners:

Apparently the Bortners spoke High German, because the recorded Wills of early Bortners were written in High German. This means that they did not come from one of the Low Countries or Northern German States.

The early Bortners were members of both the German Reformed and Lutheran churches.

There is a record in the Berlin Museum of a Coat-of-Arms authorized in 1454 by the German Emperor in Neustadt to be displayed by one Hans Bortner and his sons, Hans and Paul, presumably for valor in battle. Whether Hans Bortner was an ancestor of Balser Bortner, we do not know, but the family name was the same. Neustadt was in the Palatinate at that time.

In addition to such facts as we have, Dr. Fritz Braun recently told one of the members of the Bortner family that he thought the Bortners probably came from the Palatinate. Dr. Braun is Director of the Heimatstelle Pfalz in Kaiserslautern, which is understood to be a historical museum of the Palatinate.

Why did this Bortner family come to America? Doubtless they came, like other Germans came from the Rhineland in large numbers at that time, to be free men, to escape tyranny and oppression, to escape the ruins and horrors of frequent wars, to avoid religious discrimination, and above all, to enjoy all of the fruits of their own labor. They were doubtless peasants in the old country, and the position of peasants had only slightly improved since the Middle Ages. From their standpoint, the political and religious climate of William Penn's Colony, as well as its natural soil and climate, were better than in any other American Colony. And Penn's agents had long advertised among and solicited German protestants to come to his Colony. These sturdy farmers were among the best in Europe. They were desirable immigrants, as well as ripe for plucking away from their homeland.

Perhaps Balser Bortner, like many of his contemporaries, became a "Redemptioner" (or indentured servant) after his arrival in Philadelphia, in order to pay for the passage of his family. Such a period of voluntary servitude might have lasted as long as four or five years. In any event, the family was doubtless together on a farm during that period.

In the year 1738 there is a record of baptism of a daughter, Maria Elisabetha, by the Reverend John Casper Stoeber, in the Little Tulpehocken (Christ) Church (Evangelical Lutheran). This church, founded in 1734, then housed in a log structure, was in the Tulpehocken Settlement, located in the Northeastern part of Lancaster County. Later in 1752 most of that area became the Western part of the newly-created Berks County. Today this church is located $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles Southwest of the Village of Bernville in Jefferson Township, Berks County.

There is no record that Balser Bortner purchased land for a farm from the Proprietors, who were then the sons of William Penn. It is possible that he settled as a squatter, as many did, on land in the Tulpehocken Settlement owned by the Proprietors, and that he cleared the land of trees and built a log cabin for a home. However, it is also possible that Balser and his family actually lived on one of the two farms covered by early Warrants from the Proprietors - one in the name of his son, Jacob, in Earle Township; the other in the name of his son, Peter, in Heidelberg Township. Both of these Warrants are mentioned under the later discussions concerning the respective sons.

For information on the names of other children born to Balser and Maria Elisabetha Bortner, we are indebted to the compilation and publication by The Bortner Association, Glen Rock, Pennsylvania, of a genealogy for their branch of the family, "George Bortner of Codorus Township, York County, Pennsylvania and his descendants" (prepared by Charles H. Glatfelter and published in 1949). From that work we find the following additional information:

- Son, George, said by family tradition to have been a babe in his mother's arms when the family landed in Philadelphia in 1732.
- Son, Peter, born in 1734 in the Tulpehocken Settlement.
- Daughter, Philippina, born in 1736 in the Tulpehocken Settlement.

That work acknowledged that there may have been other children of whom they were uninformed.

The only additional child of whom we have knowledge was a son, Philip Jacob, generally called "Philip". There is no record of the year of his birth, but it is recorded that he was married in 1760. Hence, he doubtless was born sometime in the middle or late 1730's or early 1740's. Possibly he and Philippina were twins; she was born in 1736.

Balser Bortner died relatively young in 1747 or 1748. (1747 according to tradition among the descendants of his oldest son, Jacob, living in the original Tulpehocken area in Berks County - - 1748 according to tradition in the family of George, his second son, as stated in the aforementioned work of The Bortner Association.) When Balser's wife died is unknown, but it is suspected that she died about the same time.

It is believed that Balser Bortner and his family were the only ones having that family name to enter the Pennsylvania Colony. As will be shown later, a majority of their descendants have carried changed spellings of the family name - - "Bordner" and "Burtner", the former being greatest in number. There is no known record of immigrants by the name of either "Bortner", "Bordner", or "Burtner" entering the original colonies or the United States until the mid-nineteenth century, as will be discussed later.

Jacob, the oldest son of Balser, and his descendants

Before 1740 Jacob received a Warrant from the Proprietors to buy 160 acres of land in Earle Township, Lancaster County, for about 25 pounds. He probably occupied this land as a tenant on a rental basis while he undertook to pay for it, as was the usual custom. In 1743 a Patent (Deed) for this property was given to somebody else, probably because Jacob had not made the required payments to obtain title for himself. These facts are found in the Bureau of Land Records of The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in Harrisburg. In one of these records Jacob's name was misspelled "Burtner", but in another place the correct spelling was shown.

Not long thereafter on July 14, 1746, Jacob voluntarily enlisted in a force of 400 men raised in the Pennsylvania Colony to be employed, with troops from other colonies and British Regulars, to invade Canada. This was during King George's War, one of several French and Indian Wars that finally resulted in conquering Canada for the British in 1760. We learn from history that this Pennsylvania force was raised by the Colonial Governor over the objection of his pacifist-minded, Quaker-dominated legislature. The Pennsylvania troops went into Winter quarters in Albany in 1746. They were discharged in October, 1747, the expedition having been laid aside, although the War continued another year.

One of the muster-roles for this force in the Pennsylvania Archives, listed "Jacob Bordner", age 26, in 1746. Whether or not for the reason of that misspelling, or possibly because of an accumulation of such misspellings by English-speaking officials, Jacob changed the spelling of his family name to "Bordner", and that spelling has been used by all of his descendants who carry the family name. Later some of his nephews and grand-nephews also adopted that spelling. Incidentally we also find from the muster-role that Jacob was about two years older than stated in the "Adventure's" passenger-list - - not unusual when it meant a savings in fare for his ocean passage.

Jacob was released from military service just about the time that his father died. Probably he assumed responsibility for his brothers until they became old enough to support themselves. His oldest sister, Anna Maria Barbara, married a man from York County in 1748 and went there to live. It is believed that she took her two sisters with her, as stated later in the narrative relating to their brother, George, who also went to York County in the late 1750's.

Jacob married Sarah Balt, according to records of certain of his Berks County descendants, This was doubtless in the early 1750's, because their first child, a son, Jacob, was born October 23, 1754.

On April 10, 1761 Jacob was naturalized as a British citizen by the Colonial Supreme Court in Philadelphia. Their records showed his name to be "Jacob Bordner", and his residence in Berks County.

Shortly thereafter, on June 20, 1761, Jacob acquired land in Bethel Township, Berks County, by Patent (Deed) from the Proprietors, Richard and Thomas Penn, upon default by the person who held the Warrant. That property is just North and East of the present Village of Bethel; it lies on both sides of the Harrisburg-Allentown Road (U. S. Route 22). It is said to be good "limestone" land, which was prized by the Pennsylvania Dutch. It is fairly level land, although the Blue Mountain lies within sight about five miles North.

In the 1760's Jacob's Bethel farm was on the Pennsylvania frontier. Occasionally settlers in that area were killed by the Indians. During the French and Indian Wars (for which a final peace treaty was not signed until 1763), the French incited the Indians to attack the English Colonial frontier settlements. There was a line of forts along the Blue Mountain for protection of the settlers. One such fort was within sight of Jacob's house.

Jacob was too old for service in the Pennsylvania militia during the Revolutionary War, but three of his sons, Jacob Jr., John, and William, were in the militia. Although the record shows that Jacob Jr. was fined for skipping militia drills during the latter part of the war, it appears that he must have had some active service, because he was voted a pension of $40 per month in 1836 by the Pennsylvania Legislature for his war service (only about one year before he died). His name is recorded on one of the plaques to the memory of Revolutionary War soldiers in the D. A. R. Chapel at Valley Forge. After the war, Jacob Jr. held the rank of Lieutenant in the Pennsylvania militia.

When Jacob Sr. died in 1792, he Willed his 186-acre farm to Jacob Jr., but he made a settlement with his other children by requiring Jacob Jr. to make payments to them over a period of years. That was a normal pattern of handling estates in those days. Jacob Sr. was survived by five sons and one daughter, Anna Maria Schneider. Another daughter, Barbara, had died young.

Jacob's fourth son, Daniel, remained in Bethel Township, but his three other sons, John, William, and Peter, went to Lykens Valley in the Upper End of Dauphin County to the West. All of them were farmers.

Jacob's farm in Bethel Township was passed on from father to son, generation after generation. At one point, it was divided between two sons. One part remained in the possession of descendants for four generations until 1944, when the Last Bordner owner died, leaving no children.

In the 1820's one of Daniel Bordner's grandsons, also named Daniel, moved with his family to Hanover Township (the part now in Union Township) in Lebanon County, about ten miles West of Bethel. There he established an inn on the road between Allentown and Harrisburg. Later one of his sons, Daniel T., established a general store there, and the place became known as "Bordnersville". That name still appears on some more-detailed maps - - just East of the Indiantown Gap Military Reservation (Pa. Route 934). The inn was abandoned many years ago, and the general store was closed about 1955. Today there are only a few homes there at a four-corners; it is not on the main road; and no sign is displayed bearing the name "Bordnersville"; no Bordners live there now.

Several other descendants of Daniel Bordner also settled in Lebanon County over the years. Today there are many of his descendants in that county, and there are none of his descendants who bear the Bordner name remaining in Berks County. However, Lebanon County, as well as Berks County, is also the home of some of the living descendants of Jacob Bordner Jr.

In Dauphin County, just to the West of Lebanon County, there are many living descendants of John and William Bordner, who settled in the Lykens Valley. Many of them came from Powell's Valley (Jefferson Township), where one of William's sons, Jacob, settled sometime in the 1840's. In addition, Dauphin County is the home of a few of the descendants of Daniel Bordner of Berks County. There are no Bordners living in Dauphin County who are descended from Peter Bordner who also settled in the Lykens Valley, since all of his sons went to Ohio.

George, second son of Balser, and his descendants, and his sisters, Anna Maria Barbara, Philippina, and Maria Elisabetha

Anna Maria Barbara, oldest daughter of Balser Bortner, married Henry Kann "from beyond the Susquehanna" on February 17, 1748 in Christ Lutheran Church, Tulpehocken, according to its records. (Actually the record shows her name only as "Maria Barbara Bortner".) This church is located near the present village of Stouchsburg in Berks County (not far from Myerstown).

All of the following with respect to the York County Bortners is taken from the previously mentioned genealogy, "George Bortner of Codorus Township, York County, Pennsylvania", except as otherwise indicated.

Henry Kann and his wife, "Anna Barbara", lived on a farm in Codorus Township, York County. In the early 1750's, the Kanns apparently took Mrs. Kann's sister, Philippina Bortner, into their home, and shortly thereafter Philippina married Charles Shaffer of Codorus Township. On September 27, 1759, Charles and Philippina Shaffer sold 100 acres of their land to her brother, George Bortner. This is the first record that George had moved to that area. Probably after his father's death until then, he had remained in Berks County, much of the time under the protection of his older brother, Jacob.

George lived on the farm he acquired in Codorus Township until he died (about 1801). However, when he died, he owned considerably more land.

George and his two oldest sons, George Jr. and Ludwig, were in the Pennsylvania militia of York County during the Revolutionary War, according to records in the Pennsylvania Archives.

George's other sons (making seven in all) in order of their birth, were: Philip, John, Peter, Jacob, and Michael. All of the sons, except Philip, lived in York County all of their lives. Philip went to Washington County in Western Pennsylvania. George's five daughters were: Julia, Christina (Hassler), Catharine, Elizabeth, and Margaret.

Repetition of given names in the various Bortner-Bordner-Burtner families was common. This necessitates great care in distinguishing among those of the same given name - - by parentage, by location, or by year of birth.

With few exceptions, all of George's descendants who carried the family name retained the original spelling "Bortner", unlike later descendants of his brothers, Jacob, Peter, and Philip. Exceptions have been found as follows:

George's fourth son, John, settled in Hopewell Township, in Southeastern York County, before 1800. One of his grandsons, also named John, who lived there, changed his name to "Bordner".

George's fifth son, Peter, moved to Franklin Township in Northern York County, about 1801. This is near the border with Cumberland County, which lies on the North. The two oldest of Peter's five sons (George and Peter Jr.) changed their name to "Burtner", conforming to a common local misspelling. The other three sons retained the original spelling but were sometimes known as "Burtner".

This work will not list the descendants of George Bortner except those who changed their name to "Bordner" and "Burtner" and their other Bortner ancestors. For information concerning other descendants, reference should be made to the genealogy of "George Bortner of Codorus Township, York County, Pennsylvania, and his descendants".

Recently it has been reported that one Betsey Bordner married a Michael Low (Lau), and that they moved from Pennsylvania to North Carolina for a few years before finally settling in Tennessee about 1776. She was probably Maria Elisabetha, youngest daughter of Balser Bortner. It has been found that there was a Lau family in Codorus Township, York County. Therefore, it is believed that she also went there to live with her oldest sister, Mrs. Henry Kann, after their parents died.

Peter, third son of Balser, and his descendants

Very little is known about Peter Bortner and his family, compared with our knowledge of his brothers' families.

According to the genealogy of his brother, George of York County and his descendants, Peter was born in 1734 in the Tulpehocken Settlement of Lancaster County. He would have been only about 13 years old when his father died. Doubtless he remained in the family, under the protection of his oldest brother, Jacob, until the early 1750's, about the time that Jacob married. It appears that Peter was thrown on his own resources quite early in life, and that he was probably married before he was 21 (that is, by 1755).

The Pennsylvania Land Records show that Peter Bortner (also spelled "Bordner") received a Warrant from the Proprietors for 176 acres of land in Heidelberg Township, Lancaster County, under a 1735 Land Survey. Exactly when the Warrant was issued, and upon whose application, we do not know. Possibly his father obtained it, because it appears that it was obtained when Peter was very young. The records show that the Warrant was outstanding until a Patent (Deed) was issued for the property to somebody else on July 11, 1760, when Peter would have been about 26 years of age. While there is no proof that Peter actually lived on the property, under the usual rental terms while he was attempting to make the required payments, it is believed probable that he did, and that he was the one who ultimately lost the property for failure to make the required payments (just as his older brother, Jacob, apparently lost the property in Earle Township for which he had a Warrant in 1743).

Heidelberg Township was divided in half with Berks County when that County was established in 1752. It is not known whether the land covered by Peter's Warrant was in Heidelberg Township, Lancaster County, or Heidelberg Township, Berks County, after 1752; it might have been in either one. In 1785, Heidelberg Township, remaining in Lancaster County, became a part of the newly created Dauphin County; still later that area became a part of Lebanon County when it was created in 1813. Today that area is located in Eastern Lebanon County, just West of Heidelberg Township, Berks County.

There is no known record of Peter after 1760. It is suspected that he died while still very young. There is no known record of the name of Peter's wife, but it is believed that he must have married, because apparently he had one son, and possibly two - - Jacob, and possibly John.

Jacob Bortner was a young farmer in Warwick Township, Lancaster County, for the period 1773 through 1782, according to the Tax Lists of the County for that period. By a process of deduction, he is believed to have been Peter's son, although there is no direct evidence of that fact. This deduction is made on the following basis:

- (1) Jacob must have been a descendant of Balser, because he was the only Bortner registered as an immigrant from the Old World. Jacob's location in the 1770's was compatible with such a relationship.
- (2) If Jacob was descended from Balser, he must have been a grandson. He was born too late to have been a son. Besides Balser would not have had two sons, each named Jacob.
- (3) We know that Jacob was not a son of Balser's sons, Jacob, George, or Philip, because we have authentic records of their sons and have traced them.
- (4) The only remaining possibilities were that Jacob was either a son of Balser's son, Peter, or some other son of Balser of whom there is no record.

- (5) Jacob's location in the 1770's and his apparent age were compatible with Peter's age and probably location in 1760, assuming that Jacob was Peter's son.

There were two John Bortners listed in the First U. S. Census of Dauphin County ("outside Harrisburgh" - townships not shown). One was misspelled "Bartner"; the other "Portner". Such misspellings were common. We know that one was actually "John Bordner", son of Jacob Bordner of Bethel Township, Berks County. Possibly the other listing represented a duplication, but perhaps not. The other listing might have been for a son of Peter Bortner. However, there is no other known record, including subsequent U. S. Censuses, of a second such John Bortner (Bordner or Burtner) of Dauphin County, nor of other Bortners, Bordners, or Burtners who might have been his sons or daughters.

Returning to Peter's apparent son, Jacob, we find from the Pennsylvania Archives that he was in the Pennsylvania militia of Lancaster County for the period of 1779 to 1782 (the later years of the Revolutionary War). We find also from the records of the Jerusalem (White Oaks) Reformed Church in Warwick Township, the baptism of two sons of Jacob Bortner: Jacob, born in April 1774, and Simeon, born October 4, 1782. Subsequent records show that the latter was actually named "Samuel"; either the baptism record was erroneous, or his name was changed after baptism.

There is no known record of Jacob and his family after 1782 until the 1800 Census showed that he and his family were then located in East Pennsborough Township, Cumberland County, which is not far from Harrisburg, West of the Susquehanna River. They were not listed in the First U. S. Census of 1790. Possibly in 1790 they were in the process of moving from their first home in Lancaster County to their new home in Cumberland County; that would explain why they were not listed in the Census of that year.

The Will of this Jacob Bortner on file in Carlisle, the County Seat of Cumberland County, shows that he died near the end of the year 1815 in East Pennsborough Township, and his survivors were his wife, Eve (Eva); his three sons, George, Jacob, and Samuel; and his two daughters, Elizabeth (Bretz) and Barbara (Linn). Samuel was given his father's land of approximately 140 acres; the others were said to be provided for, principally during Jacob's lifetime.

George, oldest son of Jacob, was a farmer in Cumberland County until 1828, when he moved with his wife and most of his sons and daughters to Montgomery County, Ohio. Records in both counties show that George's name was frequently misspelled "Burtner" by local English-speaking officials and neighbors, but that he, himself, did not accept that spelling. However, his sons, Henry, George Otterbein, Jacob, John, and Joseph, changed the spelling of their family name, conforming to the common misspelling.

Jacob Jr., second son of Jacob and also a farmer, moved about 1803 from Cumberland County to Beaver Township, Northumberland County. That township became part of the new Union County in 1813, and the still later Snyder County, long after Jacob's death in the late 1820's (which explains where it is now located). The Junior Jacob's sons, Jacob (III), George, and Benjamin, changed the spelling of their family name to "Bordner", the most common misspelling in that area.

Samuel, third and youngest son of Jacob Sr. of Cumberland County, apparently lived with his family on his father's farm all of his life. In his later years the farm was located in Silver Spring Township, which was split off from East Pennsborough Township. Samuel, himself, changed his name to "Burtner", and all of his descendants who have carried the family name, have continued that spelling.

It is an interesting fact that many of the "Burtner" descendants of Jacob Bortner of Cumberland County have been ministers of the gospel - - principally in the United Brethren Church.

Philip, fourth and youngest son of Balser, and his descendants

There is no direct evidence that Philip Bortner was a son of Balser and Maria Elisabetha Bortner. The genealogy, "George Bortner of Codorus Township, York County, Pennsylvania, and his descendants", does not name Philip as one of their sons, although it names all of their other known children. However, it does state that there may have been other children of whom the authors had no knowledge. There are good and satisfactory reasons for concluding that Philip was one of their sons - - namely:

- (1) Philip must have been a descendant of Balser, because he was the only Bortner registered as an immigrant from the Old World.
- (2) Philip was not a son of Balser's son, Jacob, because we have authentic records of his sons and have traced them. And Philip could not have been a son of Balser's sons, George or Peter, because neither one was enough older than Philip to be his father.
- (3) Both Philip's age and location at the time of his marriage and birth of his three oldest sons are compatible with the assumption that he was Balser's son. Philip lived in Bethel Township, Berks County, which was the home of Jacob, oldest son of Balser.
- (4) Philip's youngest son was named "Balser". He was the only other "Balser Bortner" of whom there is a record. It may easily be assumed that he was a namesake for his grandfather.

The first known record of "Phillip Jacob Bortner" is that of his marriage to Maria Elisabetha Velt (both of Bethel Township, Berks County) on August 9, 1760 by the Reverend John Casper Stoever (who has been mentioned previously). Reverend Stoever's records also show that he had baptized Maria Elisabetha Velt shortly after her birth on September 4, 1741. It is reasonable to assume that Philip was not much older than his wife.

It is probable that Philip had been brought up, like his brothers, George and Peter, in Bethel Township (or nearby) under the protection of their oldest brother, Jacob, after their father died in 1747 or 1748.

Rev. Stoever's records also show the baptism of the three oldest sons of "Phillip Jacob" and Maria Elisabetha Bortner of Bethel Township, as follows:

Henry (Heinrich), born April 24, 1761

John George, born February 1, 1763 (later known simply as "George")

John (Johannes), born June 3, 1765

During the Revolutionary War Philip was in the same Battalion of the Pennsylvania militia of Berks County as his brother's son, Jacob Jr., but it is unknown whether he was in active service. Like Jacob Jr., he was fined during the later years of the war for not attending militia drills.

In 1779 Philip had moved his family to a farm in Pine Grove Township, Berks County, according to the Tax Lists of that township, preserved in the Pennsylvania Archives. Pine Grove Township is just North of Bethel Township, across the Blue Mountain. It is now located in Southern Schuylkill County.

Philip died at a relatively early age in 1786. The records of the Orphans' Court of Berks County show that he was survived by his wife, "Elizabeth", and the following children: Henry, George, John, Philip Jr., Elizabeth, Hannah, Juliana, Balser, Magdalena, and Christina. The Court found that it would be impractical to divide Philip's 200-acre plantation between the heirs, and therefore it authorized the sale of the property to the oldest son, Henry, for 165 pounds in gold - - the value appraised by an independent board for the Court.

Apparently Henry never lived on the Pine Grove farm after he bought it, but permitted his brother, George, to live on it. At any rate, it appears from the U. S. Census records of 1790 that George was then living there with his wife, mother, and one of his younger brothers (probably John, who was still unmarried), while Henry and his family, with his younger brother, Balser, and five young sisters, were living on a farm in Tulpehocken Township, Berks County (which lies Southeast of Bethel Township).

Sometime in the 1790's all of Philip's sons left Berks County.

Henry and his family, with his younger brother, Balser, and remaining unmarried sisters, went West about 30 miles to Stone Valley, an area now located in Lower Mahanoy Township in Southwestern Northumberland County. It was just East of the Susquehanna River and North of Mount Mahantango, which forms the boundary between Northumberland and Dauphin Counties. Just South of that mountain in the Lykens Valley of Dauphin County were the farms of John, William, and Peter Bordner, sons of Henry's Uncle Jacob. These two areas were connected by a pass through Mount Mahantango; in that pass is now the Village of Pillow (formerly Uniontown). Both Henry and Balser changed the spelling of their family name to "Bordner", following the spelling adopted by their Uncle Jacob and retained by his sons.

Henry had large landholdings in Stone Valley (approximately 500 acres); he was Captain of the local militia company, and a trustee of the Reformed Church congregation. Despite his success in Stone Valley, about 1810, when he was almost 50 years old, Henry moved with his large family to Stark County, Ohio, an area newly opened up for settlement. Apparently he gave a farm to his brother, Balser, who remained in Stone Valley, and sold the rest of his holdings there. Henry must have been a man of great strength, energy, and initiative, and possessed of the true pioneer spirit to undertake twice all of the hardships of clearing virgin woodland for farming and building a new home and farm buildings. Perhaps he was land-hungry, as many pioneers were. Yet he appeared to have been generous to his brothers and sisters, and to have provided well for his children.

Today there are many descendants of Balser Bordner in Northumberland County and in the adjoining Snyder County; a few of his descendants are also living in the adjoining Dauphin and Montour Counties.

Henry's brothers, George, John, and Philip Jr., cross the Allegheny Mountains sometime in the 1790's and went to farms in Western Pennsylvania not far from Pittsburgh.

Philip Jr. apparently went to that area first. Before 1800 he had married there and settled on a farm on Little Bull Creek in Deer Township (now in Harrison Township) in Northern Allegheny County. He also owned and operated a mill there. In 1821 he finished construction of a large stone house - - a three-year project. Part of the farm and the stone house have been in possession of his descendants until recently (1966).

By the year 1800, George and his wife were on a farm in Hempfield Township, Westmoreland County, and John and his family were on a farm in Pitt Township, Allegheny County - - both East of Pittsburgh. However, sometime before 1810, John and his family moved to a farm in Buffalo Township (now in Clinton Township) in Southern Butler County (just North of where Philip Jr. lived). And about 1810, George and his wife went West with his brother, Henry and family, to Stark County, Ohio.

John and Philip Jr. encountered the usual difficulty with spelling their family name. It was most often misspelled "Bourtner" in the public records, but it was sometimes misspelled "Burtner". John's sons who survived him, the sons of John's sons who had died earlier, and all of Philip's sons, changed the spelling of their family name to "Burtner". Although George was sometimes known as "Bordner", apparently he made no change in the spelling of his family name, but that made little difference, because he alone, of all the Bortner males of his time, had no children to carry the family name forward.

Today there are no descendants of John Bortner bearing the Burtner name who live in Butler County. They are scattered widely, but there are some who live in adjoining counties. Many of Philip Bortner's descendants, who bear the Burtner name, still live in Allegheny County, Butler County, and other adjoining counties.

FAMILY EMIGRATION IN AMERICA

Southward to Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina

In 1824, Henry Burtner, the oldest son of George Bortner of Cumberland County, Pennsylvania, before his father and most of his family went to Montgomery County, Ohio, married a girl from Washington County, Maryland, and went to live on a farm near Leitersburg, East of Hagerstown, in the Northern part of that County. He became a circuit-riding minister in the then new United Brethren Church and served a number of churches between Hagerstown and Staunton, Virginia, in the Great Valley which lies on the Eastern side of the main Appalachian range. This valley is called the Cumberland Valley in Pennsylvania and Maryland, but in Virginia it is called the Valley of Virginia (or Shenandoah Valley). Many Pennsylvania Dutch settled in that area, commencing before the Revolutionary War. About 1842, the Reverend Henry Burtner selected and acquired a farm near Dayton, Virginia, in the Shenandoah Valley (Rockingham County) and moved his family there.

During the Civil War, three of Henry's sons served briefly in the Virginia militia on the side of the Confederacy - - Solomon, Ezra, and George Peter. In 1864, the Union Army destroyed crops and farm buildings and equipment throughout the Shenandoah Valley, which had served as the bread-basket of the Confederacy. After that disaster, Ezra moved with his family back to Washington County, Maryland, to a farm near Hagerstown inherited by his second wife.

Henry Burtner's fourth son, William Henry, also became a minister in the United Brethren Church, as well as a farmer, in Rockingham County, Virginia. In turn, four of his eight sons became ministers - - three in the United Brethren Church; one in the Congregational Church in New England. Ezra Burtner of Washington County, Maryland, also had two sons who became ministers in the United Brethren Church.

One of Ezra Burtner's sons, David Henry, went farther down the Great Valley to North Carolina about 1890, where in Greensboro he founded a retail furniture business. It is still owned and operated by his descendants.

Northward to New York State:

About 1829 most of the family of Jacob Bortner (or Bordner) of Union County, Pennsylvania, went North to the Town of Fayette in Seneca County, New York, just South of Seneca Falls. Possibly Jacob himself had just died before the move, but he may have died soon afterwards. Two of his sons, George and Benjamin Bordner, lived on farms in that township. However, in the 1850's George and his family went West to Stephenson County, Illinois, following his older brother, Jacob Bordner of Union County and Centre County, Pennsylvania.

Another Jacob Bordner, a butcher, also moved in the late 1820's to Williams-ville, New York, which is now a suburb of Buffalo. He was an elder son of Balser Bordner of Stone Valley in Northumberland County, Pennsylvania. However, none of his children remained in New York State. About 1855, after the death of their parents, they all went to St. Joseph County, Michigan.

Westward to Ohio:

As was true for the Pennsylvania Dutch as a whole, there were many more Bordners and Burtners who went West than those who went North or South.

Eastern Ohio was opened for settlement between 1800 and 1810, following several years of warfare with the Indians and obtaining a clear title to the area by Treaty with the Indians. The first Bordners to settle in Ohio were two sons of Philip Bortner of Berks County, Pennsylvania - - Henry Bordner from Stone Valley, Northumberland County, and George Bortner from Westmoreland County. They went with their families to Canton Township in Stark County, Ohio about 1810. Apparently they purchased their farms from speculators who had bought the land shortly before 1810 from the Federal Government for $2 an acre. There is no information available as to the prices that Henry and George paid. In 1814, a local history records that a number of settlers in the Southern half of Canton Township met at the home of Henry Bordner and took action which led to separation of their locality from Canton Township; the new township became Pike Township. George and his wife lived a short distance North in Canton Township after the subdivision.

In the 1820's all of the sons of the deceased Peter Bordner of Lykens Valley in Dauphin County, Pennsylvania, followed Henry Bordner to Ohio, one by one. According to a story told by his descendants, the first one to go was young John P. Bordner, then in his teens. He went all the way on foot, carrying his rifle and a bundle of clothes, and accompanied by his dog. As previously mentioned, Henry Bordner was his father's first cousin and had been a longtime neighbor just across Mount Mahantango, which was on the North side of the Lykens Valley. Within two years of his arrival and going to work on the farm of Henry Bordner, John P. married his youngest daughter, Sarah. Henry probably gave them their first farm, but eventually John P. acquired two other farms. He remained in that area with his family all of his life, although Henry and most of the other Bordners moved away.

Also in the 1820's, John P. Bordner's brothers, Philip, Jacob, and Michael, followed him to Pike Township, Stark County, and their oldest brother, Peter Jr., and his family, followed but went on to Hopewell Township, Licking County, which is not far from Columbus. Michael soon married and went farther West to a farm near Portage in Wood County, South of Toledo - - an area that was then low and marshy. After drainage, that area was very fertile.

Sometime in the 1820's, Henry Bordner's oldest son, George, moved farther West with his family to Knox County, Ohio, commencing an exodus of all of Henry's sons from Stark County, except his youngest son, Henry Jr. George moved again to Chatfield Township, Crawford County, about 1832. Soon thereafter he was followed by his father, Henry (then a widower), his brothers, John, Philip, and Jacob, and his cousin, Jacob (brother of John P.), with their families. Henry died there in 1845 in his 85th year, after an exceptionally vigorous, venturesome, and successful life.

Sometime in the 1850's, Henry's sons, George and John, and cousin, Jacob, left Crawford County with their families, leaving only his sons, Philip and Jacob, and their families in Crawford County. George moved to a farm near Montpelier in Williams County, which is in the extreme Northwest corner of Ohio. John moved to a farm in Flatrock Township, Henry County; and cousin, Jacob, moved to a farm in Wood County, near his brother, Michael.

John Bordner of Henry County had five sons, of whom only one, David M., remained in Henry County. One by one, the others followed their Uncle George to Williams County - - Jacob, William, Daniel, and Henry. However, William and Daniel did not remain there - - William went to a farm in Hanover Township in Jackson County, Michigan, and Daniel to a farm near Clinton in De Witt County, Illinois.

From another branch of the family, George Bortner of Cumberland County, Pennsylvania moved with most of his family to Dayton Township in Montgomery County, Ohio in 1828, as previously related. Their farm was about five miles North of the City of Dayton, near the present village of Shiloh. That area is now in Harrison Township. George was generally known to his neighbors as "George Burtner Sr."; his second son, "George Burtner Jr.", although he was actually named "George Otterbein". While George Sr. did not actually change his name to "Burtner", all of his children did. George Sr. died in 1838, and his sons moved away a few years later. George Otterbein and John Burtner went to Illinois about 1844. About the same time Jacob and Joseph Burtner moved to farms in Lanier Township, in nearby Preble County. Jacob returned to Montgomery County in the early 1860's (in German Township, South of Dayton), and Joseph retired in Anderson, Indiana sometime in the 1870's. Their mother, Catharine, lived with one or the other of her children in Ohio, until she died in 1864 in the home of her son, Jacob.

Other Burtners and Bordners who went to Ohio from Pennsylvania at a later time included the following:

Peter Burtner, a carpenter and grandson of John Bortner (Burtner) of Butler County, Pennsylvania, went to Cincinnati about 1840.

William Bordner, a farmer and grandson of Daniel Bordner of Berks County, Pennsylvania, went to Stark County, Ohio about 1850, where he lived about ten years before going to Whitley County, Indiana.

William Henry Bordner, a railroad clerk and a great grandson of Daniel Bordner of Berks County, lived in Akron, Ohio, among other places, in the late 1870's and the 1880's.

Settlers in Indiana

In 1851 Philip Bordner, then a widower, moved with three of his sons, Jonathan, Daniel, and Solomon, to the area near Butler in De Kalb County, Indiana, which is in the extreme Northeastern part of the State. Philip, who had lived in Stark and Wayne Counties, Ohio, was the brother of John P. Bordner of Stark County; both had come from Dauphin County, Pennsylvania to Ohio in the 1820's.

A few years later, John Washington Bordner, a son of John P. Bordner, moved with his family from Stark County, Ohio to a farm near Ligonier, Noble County, in Northern Indiana. He was a carpenter as well as a farmer.

Sometime in the 1860's, William Bordner (originally from Pennsylvania) who had married and farmed for a few years in Stark County, Ohio, moved to a farm near Columbia City, Whitley County, also in Northern Indiana.

Another Ohioan to move to Indiana in the 1860's was Levi Bordner, adopted son of Henry Bordner Jr. of Stark County, Ohio. He and his family lived in Elkhart and Kosciusko Counties in Northern Indiana.

In the 1860's, Isaac Bordner, a son of Balser Bordner of Stone Valley, Northumberland County, Pennsylvania, moved with his family from that area to a farm near Bristol in Elkhart County.

Also in the 1860's, Augustus S. Bordner, a young school-teacher from Berks County, Pennsylvania, came to Brookston in White County in Northwestern Indiana. He was a grandson of Jacob Bordner (III), one of those in the line who owned the ancestral homestead of Jacob Bordner (I) in Berks County. Gus was soon joined there by his brother, Israel (or Isaac), and they founded a retail lumber business in Brookston. Later Israel withdrew from the lumber business and practiced the carpentry trade.

Much later, about 1900, Andrew Jacob Bordner, a farmer, came to Huntington County, Indiana, not far from Fort Wayne. He was a son of Jacob Bordner of Crawford County, Ohio, and had lived also in Seneca and Van Wert Counties in Ohio.

Also about 1900, Elsworth A. Bordner came to a farm in De Kalb County in Northeastern Indiana. He was born in Henry County, Ohio, a grandson of Jacob Bordner of Crawford County. At one time, he was a County Commissioner of De Kalb County.

There were no Burtners who settled permanently in Indiana until about 1900. Then two families from Illinois (descendants of George Otterbein Burtner) came to farms in the area near Lebanon. These were the families of George Henry and Marion Andrew Burtner. Today there are many of their descendants around Indianapolis, Lebanon, Muncie, and Marion.

Settlers in Illinois:

Central and Northern Illinois began to be settled at a rapid rate commencing about 1840. In 1840, among the early pioneers, Jonathan Bordner settled on a farm in Lewistown Township, Fulton County, in Central Illinois. Although he was born in Pennsylvania, he had been brought as a child about 1825 to Licking County, Ohio by his father, Peter Bordner Jr. of Lykens Valley, Dauphin County. Six years later, Peter's second son, Moses, and ten years later, his third son, George Washington, also came from Licking County, Ohio and settled on farms in Lewistown Township, Fulton County. Finally in 1854, Peter himself, with the rest of his family, including his two youngest sons, Peter Jr. and Alfred, moved to Lewistown Township. Peter died there in 1881, at the unusual old age of 89, after a life of hard work in pioneering twice. His wife, Christiana (or Christina) lived to be more than a hundred. They have had many descendants.

In 1844, George Otterbein Burtner and his brother, the Reverend John Burtner, moved to Central Eastern Illinois from Montgomery County, Ohio. Apparently they lived temporarily in Clark County, but by 1850, George and his family had settled permanently on a farm in Coles County, South of Ashmore and West of Westfield. George was a pioneer in developing fruit orchards and a tailor, as well as a farmer. He also gave considerable support to the establishment of the United Brethren Church in that part of Illinois. He died young of the Cholera, leaving a large family. The Reverend John Burtner followed in the footsteps of his oldest brother, the Reverend Henry Burtner of Maryland and Virginia, in becoming a minister in the United Brethren Church. He served a number of congregations in Eastern Illinois and Western Indiana. About 1870 he settled finally with his family in Vermillion, in Edgar County, Illinois, near Douglas and Champaign Counties, where the widow and most of the sons and daughters of his brother, George, then lived. His own descendants, much fewer in number, have lived principally in California.

In the late 1840's, Jacob Bordner (III) of Union County, Pennsylvania moved with his family to a farm in Buckeye Township (now in Dakota Township) near Freeport in Stephenson County, in Northern Illinois. Although Jacob Bordner was a first cousin of George Otterbein and the Rev. John Burtner, he probably never knew them, and they probably knew nothing about his settlement in Illinois. About 1852, Jacob's brother, George Bordner and his oldest son, David, with their families, also moved to farms in the same locality from Seneca County, New York State, where they had lived since about 1829.

About 1860, Daniel Bordner, settled with his family on a farm near Clinton, De Witt County, in Eastern Illinois. He was a son of John Bordner of Henry County, Ohio, but apparently had lived briefly in Williams County, Ohio before moving to Illinois.

Much later, in 1889, Harry (Henry) C. Bordner came to Chicago, Illinois with his family from Newport in Perry County, Pennsylvania. He was a grandson of William Bordner, an early settler in the Lykens Valley, Dauphin County.

Settlers in Michigan:

About 1855 George and Augustus (Gus) Bordner, stonemasons, settled in the new village of Burr Oak, St. Joseph County, in Southern Michigan, with their families and orphaned sisters and brothers, William, Henry Harrison, and Benjamin Franklin. They came from Williamsville, New York, the survivors of Jacob Bordner, an elder son of Balser Bordner of Stone Valley, Northumberland County, Pennsylvania.

Later settlers in Michigan included the following and their families:

Milo A. Bordner, onetime member of a Michigan regiment during the Civil War, came to Ionia, Michigan about 1870 from Ohio. He was a son of Jacob Bordner of Crawford County, Ohio.

William Bordner moved to a farm in Hanover Township, Jackson County, from Williams County, Ohio in the late 1870's. He was a son of John Bordner of Henry County, Ohio.

David R. Bordner moved to a farm in Colfax Township, Huron County (near Bay City) about 1880, from the Lykens Valley in Dauphin County, Pennsylvania. He was a great grandson of John Bordner, an early settler in the Lykens Valley.

Isaac (or Isaiah) Bordner moved to a farm near Midland in Midland County from Wood County, Ohio in 1903. He was a son of Jacob Bordner of Wood County who had also lived in Stark and Crawford Counties, in Ohio, after coming from the Lykens Valley in Dauphin County, Pennsylvania in the 1820's.

Settlers in the Great West:

Among the Bordners and Burtners, the only known emigrant to California during the Gold Rush was Jacob Bordner of Berks County, Pennsylvania, grandson of Daniel Bordner. He went to California in 1851. There is no known additional information concerning him, and no descendants have been found.

Otherwise, the first known Burtners or Bordners to move West of the Mississippi River were Reuben and Daniel Burtner, sons of Samuel Burtner of Cumberland County, Pennsylvania. They went to Muscatine, Iowa in the mid 1850's. In the 1870's, Reuben and his family went to Nebraska, but by 1880 they were living on a ranch near Ellsworth, Kansas. Daniel Burtner and his family went back to Pennsylvania for several years, but eventually returned to Muscatine.

There were no other known Burtners or Bordners West of the Mississippi River before the Civil War. However, there were not many settlers in the Plains and Rocky Mountain States before the Civil War. Settlers in Kansas and Nebraska up to about 1890, and in Colorado, Utah, and Montana up to the early 1900's, may properly be considered to have been pioneers.

Following is a chronological list of the Bordners and Burtners who went West beyond the Mississippi after the Civil War up to the early 1900's. Since that time it has become common to move around, and migration is not at all comparable to what it used to be. Hence, more recent movements are not listed.

Henry Bordner, son of Jacob Bordner of Stephenson County, Illinois to Jesup, Iowa (Buchanan County) about 1869.

Andrew Burtner, son of John Bortner of Butler County, Pennsylvania to Moniteau County, Missouri about 1870, following several years in Indiana.

Benjamin Franklin Bordner, son of Philip Bordner of Crawford County, Ohio, to near Circleville, Kansas, in early 1870's.

Jonathan Bordner, son of Philip Bordner of De Kalb County, Indiana, to Kansas in early 1870's. However, he returned to De Kalb County before 1880.

Andrew Burtner, grandson of John Bortner of Butler County, Pennsylvania to Morgan County, Missouri about 1875. However, all except one of his sons returned to Western Pennsylvania.

Henry Harrison Bordner of Burr Oak, Michigan to near Monona, Iowa in 1876.

Reverend George Washington Burtner, son of the Reverend John Burtner of Edgar County, Illinois, to California in mid 1870's.

Continuation of list from preceding page:

- Edward H. Bordner, great grandson of Jacob Bordner Jr. of Berks County, Pennsylvania, to Washington County, Kansas in late 1870's.
- James Burtner, great grandson of John Bortner of Butler County, Pennsylvania to near Manhattan, Kansas about 1879.
- George I. Bordner, great grandson of John Bordner of Dauphin County, Pennsylvania, to Council Grove, Kansas about 1883.
- Benjamin Franklin Burtner, grandson of George Otterbein Burtner of Illinois to Rockwall, Texas in 1884.
- William S. Bordner, great grandson of Balser Bordner of Northumberland County, Pennsylvania, to Pilger, Nebraska about 1884.
- George Henry Burtner, grandson of George Otterbein Burtner of Illinois, to near Pleasanton, Kansas in 1888. However, he returned to Illinois in 1902.
- Ruallen Bordner, great grandson of Daniel Bordner of Berks County, Pennsylvania, went West sometime in 1880's, but disappeared.
- Alfred Bordner, son of Jonathan Bordner of Fulton County, Illinois, to Taylor County, Iowa about 1890.
- Albert Lee, Charles W., and John W. Bordner, sons of Peter Bordner Jr. of Fulton County, Illinois to Texas about 1890.
- Charles A. Bordner, son of Alfred Bordner of Fulton County, Illinois to Erath County, Texas in the 1890's.
- William Bordner, son of William Bordner of Columbia County, Indiana to Denver, Colorado about 1890.
- Frank and Oliver Bordner, grandsons of Balser Bordner of Northumberland County, Pennsylvania to Nebraska about 1892.
- Isaac and Samuel T. Bordner, great grandsons of Balser Bordner of Northumberland County, Pennsylvania to Pilger, Nebraska in the early 1890's.
- William H. Bordner, son of Daniel Bordner of De Witt County, Illinois, to Grand Island, Nebraska in the 1890's.
- Joseph F. Bordner, son of John P. Bordner of Stark County, Ohio, to Wichita, Kansas in the 1890's.
- Henry Bordner, son of Philip Bordner of Crawford County, Ohio, to San Francisco, California about 1892.
- Fremont Charles Bordner, great grandson of Daniel Bordner of Berks County, Pennsylvania, to San Francisco, California in the 1890's.
- Isaac Bordner, son of Philip Bordner of Crawford County, Ohio to Pasadena, California in the late 1890's.
- Isaac Andrew Bordner, grandson of Philip Bordner of Crawford County, Ohio, to Los Angeles area in the late 1890's.
- William B. Burtner, son of Andrew Burtner of Morgan County, Missouri, to near Hooper, Colorado, about 1900.
- James Henry Burtner, son of Reverend John Burtner of Illinois, to California about 1900.
- Reverend Markwood Monroe Burtner, son of Ezra Burtner of Washington County, Maryland, to Washington and Oregon about 1900 from Pennsylvania.
- William T. Hamilton Burtner, son of Ezra Burtner of Washington County, Maryland, to San Francisco about 1900.
- Jacob Herman (Herman Jacob) Burtner, grandson of Philip Bortner of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania to near Carleton, Nebraska about 1900.

Continuation of list from preceding page:

Albert W. Bordner, grandson of John P. Bordner of Stark County, Ohio, to Oklahoma, soon after 1900.
Irving J. Bordner, grandson of John P. Bordner of Stark County, Ohio, to Indio, California, soon after 1900.
Marion Bordner, son of George Washington Bordner of Fulton County, Illinois, to Bennett, Colorado about 1905.
Charles E. Bordner, son of Jonathan Bordner of De Kalb County, Indiana to Utah in early 1900's.
William W. Bordner, son of Jonathan Bordner of De Kalb County, Indiana to Butte, Montana in early 1900's.
Henry Harrison Burtner, great grandson of John Bortner of Butler County, Pennsylvania to Oklahoma in early 1900's.
Oscar F. and Jay Bordner, sons of Harry (Henry) C. Bordner, from Chicago, Illinois to Waterloo, Iowa (with mother) in early 1900's. Later Oscar F. lived in New Mexico and California.
Andrew C. Burtner, son of Andrew Burtner of Moniteau County, Missouri, to Lakeside, California about 1900.
Stanton W. Bordner, great great grandson of Jacob Bordner Jr. of Berks County, Pennsylvania to Pittsburg, California, in early 1900's.
William Burtner, son of James Burtner of Manhattan, Kansas, to Colorado in 1909.
Thomas Jefferson Burtner, grandson of George Otterbein Burtner of Illinois to near Miles City, Montana in 1912. However, he returned to Illinois in 1930.

Immigrants to the Philippine Islands:

Immediately after the Spanish-American War, John Harvey Bordner, a son of William Henry Bordner of Pennsylvania and Ohio, was with the U. S. Army stationed in the newly-won Philippine Islands. After his enlistment expired, he remained there and settled with his Filipino wife on a coconut-and-rice plantation near Zamboanga City. Upon his death in 1964, he had many surviving descendants there.

In 1902, about the same time, Harvey Albert Bordner, a great great grandson of Jacob Bordner Jr. of Berks County, Pennsylvania, went to the Philippine Islands to teach in the public schools. He remained there for 34 years until his retirement in 1936, when he returned with his wife to live in Indianapolis. He was Superintendent of Schools in the City of Manila for the last 18 years of residence.

ORIGIN OF THE FAMILY NAME

Authorities tell us that family names began to be used in Western Europe and England about the 12th century, and that the original purpose was to provide a means for distinguishing within a community between those who had the same Christian name. For example, there might be several "Johns" in a community. To identify one, he might be called "John who lives near the Woods"; to identify another, he might be called "John the Smith" (blacksmith). The next steps were to shorten and formalize the descriptive suffix (for example, simply "Woods" and "Smith"), and to give the same descriptive name to a man's children, to his sons' children, and so on. The old practice was preserved of varying the given name of each individual, generally using one of a number of long-established Christian names, but making the given name the first name. Women took the family names of their husbands, since the male was dominant in European culture.

Later the use of middle names was adopted to assist further in establishing individual identification. For example, the time came when there were too many "John Smiths". Addition of a middle name for each one would make the complete name more distinctive. Examination of the name listings in this genealogy will amply illustrate the value of middle names (or just middle initials) for the purpose of individual identification.

In trying to find the significance of the name "Bortner", the key would normally be in the stem "Bort". The suffix "er" (or "ner") means a man who does something or is identified with something. For example, a "gardener" is a man who maintains a garden (even in English). "Borte" means border, braid, or lace. "Bord" means board. One might make something of this, such as "he who lives on the border or edge", but there is no means of knowing whether such a conclusion would be true.

A search in the Library of Congress for the origin of the name "Bortner", in German works on the subject of origin of German family names, showed the following: While the name "Bortner" was not listed, the name "Portner" was found; it was said to be a variation of an original family name "Pförtner". Another variation mentioned was "Fortner". One might reasonably guess that the name "Bortner" was a variation of "Portner". In old German script, a capital "P" was much like a capital "B", and their sounds were much alike. However, there is no known evidence that "Bortner" was so derived.

"Pförtner" means gatekeeper or porter. A castle gatekeeper was a common functionary in the middle ages.

A large collection of German coats-of-arms in the Library of Congress contains one for a family of noble blood named "Pförtner von der Hölle" who lived in Silesia (East of Prussia, but now in Poland); authority for this coat-of-arms was granted in the year 1438. Another coat-of-arms is also shown in the same collection for a related family, named simply "Pförtner", many of whose members were said to be mentioned in records of Prussian military service. It is doubted that the Bortner family - - probably a peasant family in the Rhine River Valley at the same time - - was related to either of those families. As mentioned previously, one Hans Bortner and his sons, Hans and Paul, received authority to display a coat-of-arms in the year 1454. However, it is believed that "Pförtner" was such a common descriptive personal noun in German-speaking countries during the Middle Ages as to make it likely that there were several unrelated families who had that name.

When the German "o" has two dots above it, the sound is modified (umlaut); in English it sounds much like a short "e" or short "u". Thus "Pförtner" sounds in English something like "Pfërt'nër", but not precisely so.

No record has been observed showing that "Bortner" was written in German with two dots above the "o", except a passenger-list of certain later Bortner arrivals in the United States (1853). However, an expert on Pennsylvania Dutch writing and language, stated that it was not always the practice, in writing names, to indicate that a vowel was subject to the umlaut, although in fact it was. The fact that some English-speaking people wrote the name "Burtner", if based upon the way that it was pronounced in German, would be an indication that the "o" was subject to the umlaut. And if the "o" was subject to the umlaut, it would be a good indication that "Bortner" had been derived from "Pförtner".

CHANGES OF THE FAMILY NAME TO "BORDNER" AND "BURTNER"

Spelling German family names was and still is difficult for English-speaking people who know nothing of the German language. The difficulty is natural because of basic differences in the phonetic systems of the English and German languages, although the alphabets are the same. The English phonetic system is chaotic (much worse than the German system). English vowels and diphthongs are each subject to more different sounds than the German, and unlike the German, are not subject to either special pronunciation-marks or hard-and-fast rules (in relation to the spelling) for the selection of one sound as compared with another. The English language requires memorizing the vowel sounds in every written word, as well as spelling, and until one hears an authoritative pronunciation and sees the spelling of a new word (or looks up both pronunciation and spelling in a dictionary), he has no certainty of either.

Therefore, it is not strange that many (perhaps most) Pennsylvania Dutch names underwent changes in spelling, as compared with the German. For example: Maier, Meier, Meyer, Myers, Mayer; Schneider, Snyder; Müller, Mueller, Miller; Schaeffer, Schaffer, Shaffer, Shafer; Frei, Frey, Fry; Küfer, Kiefer, Keefer; Lasch, Lash, Losh; Emerich, Emerick; Brecht, Bright; Focht, Fought; Eisenhauer, Eisenhower; Feuerstein, Firestone.

Records indicate that English-speaking people in Pennsylvania in the early days misspelled the Bortner name about as often as they spelled it correctly. While "Bordner" and "Burtner" were common misspellings, there were many others, including Portner, Bartner, Butner, Bertner, Birtner, Boardner, Bourtnier, Bournier, Borden, Boardman, Border, and Borgner. Some of these were legitimate names of other families, Pennsylvania Dutch or English.

Signatures in a number of Bortner Deeds and Wills showed that they sometimes still signed their name "Bortner" long after others spelled their name "Bordner" or "Burtner". Indeed, cases have been found where descendants caused a changed name to be chiseled on a tombstone, when the deceased had indicated by signature in his Will or a late Deed that no change had been made. However, ultimately a majority of the Bortners accepted one or the other of those two misspellings - - apparently whichever one was most common in their community. It is noteworthy that "Burtner" was the most common misspelling in widely separated Cumberland County and Western Pennsylvania (in each of which there were many Protestant Scotch-Irish settlers), and that "Bordner" was the most common misspelling in the original Pennsylvania-Dutch country, where the English-speaking people included many Quakers. It is also noteworthy that the "Bortner" name was retained finally only by most of the descendants of George Bortner in Southern York County, most of whom remained close together for many years in a relatively pure Pennsylvania-Dutch community.

As previously speculated, it is possible that the "Burtner" spelling was a fairly faithful English spelling of the name, based upon its actual pronunciation, if the "o" was subject to the umlaut. But possibly that spelling was based only upon the similarity of the name to the more familiar "Burton". The "Bordner" spelling might also have been based only upon the similarity of the name to the more familiar "Borden", or it might have been based upon a kind of reverse logic in the light of the German pronunciation. That is, if one actually understood the name to be pronounced "Bortner", as it normally sounds in English (and also in German, without the "o" subject to the umlaut), he might reason that: (1) there is no such name in English; (2) every Dutchman pronounces "d" like "t"; (3) therefore, he must spell the name with a "d" rather than a "t"; and (4) the result, "Bordner", does resemble at least the common English name "Borden".

The points at which the family name was changed in each branch of the family have been determined as carefully as possible, as related in the preceding Family History in America. It may be helpful for more convenient reference to list here in one place the names of those who first made the change (with indication of their generation, considering Balser Bortner as in the first generation).

Changes from Bortner to Bordner:

Generation	Name
2	Jacob (1720 - 1792) of Bethel Township, Berks County, Pa. Descendants of George Bortner of York County, Pa. -
5	John (1824 - 1871), grandson of John Bortner of Hopewell Township, York County. (However, his oldest son, Jacob F., changed his name back to Bortner.) Descendants of Peter Bortner of Lancaster County, Pa. -
4	Possibly Jacob (1774 - c1829) of Union County, Pa., son of Jacob Bortner of Lancaster County and Cumberland County, Pa. But if he did not change his name, his sons did, as follows:
5	Jacob (1801 - 1880) of Stephenson County, Illinois
5	George (1804 - 1882) of Seneca County, N. Y. and Stephenson County, Illinois
5	Benjamin (1815 - c1875) of Seneca County, N. Y. Sons of Philip Bortner of Berks County, Pa. -
3	Henry (1761 - 1845) of Northumberland County, Pa. and Stark County, Ohio
3	Balser (1778 - 1853) of Northumberland County, Pa.

OTHER BORTNER, BORDNER, AND BURTNER IMMIGRANTS IN AMERICA
AND THEIR DESCENDANTS

A search was made for Bordner and Burtner names and addresses in the telephone directories of all the principal cities in the United States. A library of such directories is maintained by the Bell Telephone Company in Washington, D. C. In addition, many telephone directories for other places were obtained and examined. By one means or another (principally correspondence), each Bordner and Burtner found listed was identified, with only one exception (one Burtner in New York City). All of those identified were found to be descendants of Balser Bortner (and are listed in this genealogy), with the following exceptions:

In New York City and in nearby New Jersey, there are several descendants of Maximilian Bordner, who, it was said, was born in Vienna, Austria in 1887 and was brought to the United States by his family in 1888.

In Northfield, Massachusetts and Hinsdale, New Hampshire, there are two sons of Stephen Bordner, who, it was said, also was born in Austria and came to the United States about 1903.

In Maryland, there are three sons of Philip Bodnar, a White Russian refugee who fled Russia during the 1917 revolution and came to the United States. It was said that he changed his name to "Bordner", because he liked that name better.

In Waterbury and Thomaston, Connecticut, there are two brothers named Bordner, one of whom stated that they are descendants of another foreign immigrant who also changed his name. He did not disclose the original name.

It is suspected that the unidentified Burtner in New York City is not a descendant of Balser Bortner. It is possible that there may be additional exceptions in some rural areas, of whom the author has no knowledge.

In addition to the search during this project for Bordners, Burtners, and their Bortner ancestors, both living and dead, the various records examined were reviewed for evidence of other Bortners, Bordners, and Burtners who were not born in the United States. Only one was found: Jacob Bordner, born 1841/2 in Baden - a brickmaker in Williams County, Ohio - listed in the 1870 U. S. census schedules. Although married to a woman with children by a previous marriage, he apparently had no children of his own.

In addition, a special search was made in the National Archives of the indexes of arrivals by ship in all of the Atlantic and Gulf-Coast Ports, for immigrants named Bortner, Bordner, and Burtner. These indexes were not complete; the index for each port covered a different period. While the Philadelphia index covered the longest period (1800 to 1906)*, the New York index covered only the period

*The previously-mentioned work, "Pennsylvania German Pioneers", by Strassburger and Hinke, purports to list all arrivals in the Port of Philadelphia from Europe for the period 1727 to 1808. Balser Bortner and his family were the only Bortners listed; no Bordners or Burtners were listed.

1820 to 1846 (the shortest period of any, by far). Since New York was the principal port of entry in the later years, this left a large gap in the search. It was not feasible to make a detailed search of the New York arrival lists for the entire period since 1846. The following arrivals were found:

June 7, 1853 - Herman Heinrich Bortner, age 39, and family. Born in Hanover. Destination - Pittsburgh.

- Theresia Bortner, age 16. Born in Bavaria. Destination - Baltimore. (She came on the same ship with the first named above, although she was not listed as traveling with them.)

May 5, 1854 - Wilhelm Bordner, age 18. Born in Hanover. Destination - Cincinnati.

April 2, 1879- Franz Bordner, age 41. Of Swedish nationality.

June 4, 1884 - Mrs. Anna Bortner, age 25, and infant daughter. Of German nationality.

No living descendants, named Bordner or Burtner, of the above listed males have been found, nor of any others whose arrivals were not indexed, except as stated in the first paragraph of this section. (No such statement can be made with respect to living descendants who spell their name "Bortner", because the search did not cover the living Bortners.)

It is interesting to observe where the more recent arrivals of Bortners and Bordners came from: Hanover (in Northern Germany); Baden and Bavaria (in Southern Germany); Austria (which adjoins Bavaria); and even one from Sweden. It is interesting also that the name "Bortner" was written in the 1853 passenger-list with two dots over the "o" (umlaut). And it is interesting that some of the immigrants spelled their name "Bordner"; whether their family name was once spelled "Bortner" in the Old World is unknown.

BACKGROUND - EARLY PENNSYLVANIA HISTORY

William Penn obtained a Charter in 1681 from King Charles II of England for a colony in the New World in payment of a debt owed to his father, Admiral Sir William Penn. The Charter included a grant of ownership of all the land West of the Delaware River for 5° of longitude, between 40° and 43° North Latitude. William Penn was given the right to name the Governor of the Colony, but a legislative assembly, representing the people, was required. Proprietary rights were hereditary.

Previously in 1643 there had been a settlement established at the mouth of the Schuylkill River, on the Delaware River, as an offshoot of a Swedish Colony centered at the present site of Wilmington, Delaware. In 1655 the entire Colony of New Sweden had been taken by the Holland Dutch by military force and made a part of New Netherlands, which initially included much of the area now included in New York State. Then in 1664 England acquired all of New Netherlands as a result of defeating the Netherlands in a War.

William Penn was a member of the religious Society of Friends, known as the Quakers. He planned to make his colony a "Holy Experiment" with the help of the Quakers - - a colony where all the people might live together in peace, with religious liberty and freedom, provided only that they believe in God. However, non-Christians were not to be allowed to participate in the Government. This was more religious freedom than was generally available in the other colonies. As it turned out, there was also more democracy in Pennsylvania than in most of the other colonies, notwithstanding the semi-feudalistic character of Penn's proprietorship.

Penn named the colony the "Commonwealth of Pennsylvania", in honor of his father (meaning Penn's woodland). He established a capital at the mouth of the Schuylkill River, on the West side of the Delaware River, and named it "Philadelphia" (meaning brotherly love). Philadelphia was well-located for a seaport.

Penn himself came to the Colony in the year 1682 and remained for two years, during which the legislative assembly was established and he made a treaty of peace with the Indians and formally purchased title to the land in the Southeastern part of the colony. He appointed himself Governor.

After Penn returned to England, he depended upon his appointed Deputy Governor and Council to protect his interests in actual operation of the colony. He devoted considerable efforts towards planning and promoting desirable immigration to the colony. For example, he personally wrote pamphlets on the advantages of the colony from the standpoint of geography and natural resources, as well as its political and religious freedom, and in those pamphlets he offered land for sale at low prices and low quit-rents; he offered 50 acres of free land to every indentured servant upon completion of his period of servitude; and he gave useful instructions to prospective immigrants.

Previously Penn had made several tours of the Netherlands and the German States along the Rhine River, during which he had sought to make converts to the Quaker faith, especially among the Mennonites. Some English Quakers settled there as a nucleus for establishment of the sect. Later some of them were to aid in inducing Germans to go to Pennsylvania. Soon after Penn obtained his Charter, some Mennonites around Frankfurt were induced to form a corporation, and Penn gave them 15,000 acres of land for a settlement. That settlement became Germantown - - the first of the German settlements in Pennsylvania. Today Germantown is part of the City of Philadelphia. These Mennonites, however, were not the first German settlers in Pennsylvania. There were some Germans in the Old Swedes Settlement before Penn obtained his charter.

Penn had his political troubles in England, and even temporarily lost his rights for a few years. During the period from 1699 to 1701, he made one more and last trip to the Colony. He died in 1718.

Proprietary rights in the Colony passed to Penn's sons, John, Thomas, and Richard. The brothers placed sole responsibility for management of the Colony on Thomas, and when John died in 1746 he bequeathed his interest to Thomas. Although Thomas Penn did not assume the Governorship, he resided in Philadelphia from 1732 to 1741. Thereafter he was forced by the King to remain in England. However, his oldest son, John, was a resident of Pennsylvania and represented him from 1751 until the Revolutionary War, when the Penns' proprietary rights were terminated and their lands were taken over by the Commonwealth.

The Colony received many settlers including, in particular, good and experienced farmers, and it grew rapidly and prospered. It profited by the mistakes made in the earlier English colonies, especially those in Virginia and Massachusetts, and it never had as many growing pains as they did.

At first the land was settled around Philadelphia in the three original counties, Philadelphia, Bucks, and Chester. Then settlements fanned out farther and farther to the West and Northwest. New treaties with the Indians, including purchases of land title, were made from time to time as required. Altogether there were 33 treaties and purchases -- the last being made after the Revolutionary War for land in the Northwestern part of the State. Additional counties were created as new purchases of land were made from the Indians, and older counties were subdivided and realigned into new counties as the population grew.

The main flow of German settlers into Pennsylvania commenced about 1710, and became a flood after 1717. While at first they were called Palatines (from the Palatinate in the Rhine River Valley), they were later called Pennsylvania Dutch. The English settlers became concerned over the arrival of so many Germans, speaking a different language, having different customs, and accustomed to a different form of government. Therefore a law was enacted in 1727 requiring all arrivals in the Port of Philadelphia from Continental Europe to take an Oath of Allegiance to the British Crown. Two years later the law was extended to require an Oath of Fidelity to the Proprietors and laws of the province, and an oath of abjuration of the King's enemies (that is, denial of support). The signing of such oaths was unnecessary, and would have been ineffectual if fears had been justified, but at least it provided complete records of German immigrants for reference by their descendants.

One authority estimated that there were approximately 65,000 German immigrants between 1727 and the beginning of the Revolutionary War in 1775, based upon the number of heads of families who signed the oaths. Several authorities estimated that Germans comprised about one-third of the total population of Pennsylvania at different dates from 1750 to 1776. (One estimate of the total population was 140,000 in 1750; another was 160,000 in 1776.) The authorities thought that the Quakers were about equal in numbers to the Germans; the other one-third to be comprised principally of other Englishmen, Welch, and Scotch-Irish.

Since the earlier settlers had pre-empted the land nearest Philadelphia, the Pennsylvania Dutch were forced to settle on the then frontier in what are now Montgomery, Lehigh, Berks, and Lancaster Counties. Later they spread West and Northwest into the adjoining counties (including those just West of the Susquehanna River) until they were blocked by the main Allegheny mountains. (The mountains run in parallel ridges from Northeast to Southwest.) It was not until after the Revolutionary War that they crossed the Alleghenies in large numbers. In the meantime, many drifted Southwestward in the Great Valley on the Eastern side of the Appalachian mountains into Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina.

The Presbyterian Scotch-Irish from Northern Ireland also flowed into Pennsylvania in large numbers, following somewhat behind the flow of Germans. Consequently they settled farther West and crossed the Alleghenies to Western Pennsylvania in larger numbers and earlier than the Germans.

Pennsylvania farmers had large families. It was necessary to have sons and daughters to help with the large amount of work required in constructing buildings, clearing land of trees, tilling the soil, harvesting, raising livestock, preserving food, making cloth and clothing, etc. Even with a large family, 160 acres was considered an ideal-sized farm; many farms were smaller. And when the owner of such a farm died, it could not be subdivided economically into smaller parcels and given to all of his sons. Because additional virgin land was unavailable near their homes, some of the sons were pressured into going to new land farther away. Otherwise they were forced to become laborers for wages, and for some years there was a limited demand for common labor.

The final struggle between Great Britain and France for the New World began in 1754 on Pennsylvania soil. It began when a French force seized a fort being constructed by Virginia provincial troops at the junction of the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers, which is the source of the Ohio River. This land was claimed by both Virginia and Pennsylvania under their charters. The French were determined to hold the entire Ohio River Valley, as well as the St. Lawrence River Valley, the Great Lakes area, and the Mississippi River Valley. They had fur-trading posts and missions among the Indians throughout that area. Their only real settlements were a few on the St. Lawrence, and their total population was small. In contrast, the British colonies were concentrated along the Atlantic Coast from New Hampshire to Georgia; their population was much larger; they were well on the road to being self-sustaining and even contributing members of the British Empire; and Westward expansion was to be expected.

The British Government immediately sent troops to Virginia under the command of General Edward Braddock for the purpose of undertaking an expedition to retake the fort. They already had Virginia's complete cooperation, and they requested Pennsylvania's similar cooperation. The Pennsylvania Assembly was dominated by the pacifist-minded Quakers. In the previous King George's War (1746 - 1749), the Assembly would not vote for assistance, and the Governor then raised a voluntary force of 400 men for an expedition against Canada (in which Jacob Bortner enlisted, as previously related). The Assembly again rejected the call for aid, preferring to let the French have Western Pennsylvania than sacrifice their Quaker principles. In vain the Proprietors and the Governor tried to induce the Assembly to provide assistance.

As generally known, General Braddock's force was ambushed by the French and Indians and destroyed in late 1755 near Ft. Du Quesne (as the French named their fort at the forks of the Ohio). George Washington of Virginia was Braddock's aide, but he had no command. During the expedition up the Potomac River Valley and through Southwestern Pennsylvania, their only assistance from Pennsylvania was from a supply-train of 150 teams and wagons and a large number of horses hired from and driven by Pennsylvania Dutch farmers, after an appeal to them by Benjamin Franklin, then a Philadelphia printer and publisher and a budding politician.

Following Braddock's defeat, the French succeeded in inciting many bands of Indians (including the Delaware tribe of Pennsylvania, who had long been friendly) to attack the Pennsylvania frontier settlements East of the mountains. Previous difficulties with the Delawares had been more-or-less individual incidents. Now there were a number of massacres in the frontier settlements, extending from Cumberland County on the West to Berks County East of the Susquehanna, and involving Pennsylvania Dutch, Scotch-Irish, and English settlers. They immediately cried loudly for help from Philadelphia - - for arms and ammunition in particular.

At that point the Assembly had been engaged for sometime in a stubborn fight with the Governor over assistance to the Crown. The Assembly, with tongue in cheek, had agreed to provide assistance, with necessary taxation, providing the Proprietors were taxed on their vast Estate of unsold (and unproductive) virgin land. The Governor was forced by the Proprietors to veto the proposed tax. While the Quakers were opposed to war, they thought that it might be worth assistance in this war if they could establish the principle of taxing the Proprietors' Estate. Moreover, by their position they could shift blame to the Governor and Proprietors for inaction on assistance.

Now the frontiersmen arose in wrath, and bands of them descended on Philadelphia, demanding action from the Assembly. In response, the Proprietors made a voluntary grant of money to the Colonial Treasury in lieu of taxes, and the Assembly finally authorized formation of local militia companies by the people, erection and manning of frontier forts, and provision of arms and ammunition, without taxing the Proprietors' Estate.

In 1758 the British Government sent another force, this time to Philadelphia, to recapture Ft. Du Quesne, under the command of General John Forbes. Pennsylvania provided assistance, including a force of men larger than the Virginia and North Carolina forces. The Pennsylvania force was composed principally of Pennsylvania Dutch volunteers under command of foreign officers who could speak German. The expedition took several months to cross the mountains, because they had to open a rough road beyond Bedford. Probably it would have been quicker to go South into Maryland and up the old Braddock road, as contended by George Washington (in command of the Virginia and North Carolina troops).

In the meantime the Pennsylvania and New York Governors had acted together, through representatives, to induce a great many of the Indian allies of the French to desert them. A Pennsylvania Dutchman, a Moravian Missionary to the Indians, named Christian Frederick Post, bravely played a major role in those negotiations, going among the Indians in the presence of the French, at great personal risk and hardship.

It was Winter when Forbes' Army reached Ft. Du Quesne after extraordinary efforts and hardships. The weakened French retired without a fight and left the area forever. The place was immediately renamed Pittsburgh in honor of the British Prime Minister, and a new and better fort was erected there named Fort Pitt. General Forbes soon died as a result of the hardships he had undergone.

The rest of this last French and Indian War was conducted largely on the soil of New York State and Canada. It was climaxed by the successful conquest of Quebec by a British Army under General James Wolfe on September 18, 1759.

The War had several important consequences for Pennsylvania. It brought about a certain degree of cooperation between the Colonies for a common end, and this was preparation for the Confederation of Colonies during the Revolutionary War, which was soon to begin. It began to make patriots out of the settlers, including the Pennsylvania Dutch and Scotch-Irish on the frontiers who arose to defend their homes; and it brought about arming the people (especially through their militia). It unified the non-Quaker elements, and that was the beginning of the end for Quaker domination of the Assembly, since it led to forced changes in representation to make the membership more nearly proportional to the elements of the population .

It was some years later before Pennsylvania finally established its legal right to the Southwestern part of the State against the Virginia claim. Pennsylvania also successfully defended similar claims by Maryland and Connecticut for part of its territory. However, a territorial dispute with New York resulted in Pennsylvania giving up about one-third of its original territory on the North. Its Northern boundary was moved South from the 43rd to the 42nd parallel of latitude, except for a small triangle of land in the Northwest corner of the State for a port on Lake Erie (in which was the site of the present City of Erie).

In 1763 the British Government decreed that no settlements should be established West of the Appalachian Mountains, out of respect for Indian ownership of those lands. That decree was respected by the Northern Colonies, but failure to respect it by the Southern Colonies led to trouble with the Indians, especially in the early settlements in Kentucky, concerning which no treaties were first made with the Indian residents. From 1763 to 1766 occurred the Indian War known as the Conspiracy of Pontiac. Pontiac was an Ottawa Chief from the Great Lakes area. He succeeded in uniting many of the Indian tribes East of the Mississippi to fight for their lands West of the mountains.

While most of the action in connection with Pontiac's conspiracy was in the West, Pennsylvania did not escape involvement. There were Indian raids on the thinly populated settlements along the frontier, especially in the valleys of the Northern and Western branches of the Susquehanna River, and attacks on the Western Pennsylvania forts. Fort Pitt was saved by a rescue force of Pennsylvania troops, but two smaller forts between Fort Pitt and Lake Erie were captured by the Indians.

Less than ten years later in 1774, the First Continental Congress convened in Philadelphia to present united demands of the Colonies to the Crown for redress of grievances, particularly as concerned taxation. Philadelphia was then the largest city in the Colonies; it also was at one of the most convenient locations for meetings of the representatives of the colonies as a whole. The Second Continental Congress also convened there one year later, after fighting had commenced around Boston between Colonial forces and the British force that occupied that city. The Second Congress took steps for a united defense by troops from all of the Colonies and appointed George Washington as Commander-in-Chief of the Continental Army. Those actions were accompanied by political changes in each of the colonies. Each colony adopted a new Constitution under which it elected its own Governor, as well as its own legislature. The confederation of colonies was weak because it was dependent upon the individual colonies for its military forces that it asked them to raise, and only the individual colonies had the power to raise taxes to support them.

Ultimately the Continental Congress did raise money for support of the war by borrowing and by printing its own currency (although such currency declined greatly in value). Another weakness was the absence of adequate organization of the central government; it had no Chief Executive except the President of the Congress, and he had no adequate staff.

Early in 1776 Washington's Army maneuvered the British Army out of Boston. It went to Long Island, New York. Shortly afterwards the Declaration of Independence was signed by the members of the Continental Congress on July 4, 1776. Benjamin Franklin was the leading member of the Pennsylvania delegation which signed it.

There soon followed a defeat of the Continental Army on Long Island, and a retreat to Philadelphia. The British settled down for the Winter in New York and Eastern New Jersey, and posted hired German (Hessian) troops at the end of their line in Trenton, New Jersey, near the Delaware River. Just before Christmas in 1776 Washington executed his famous night-time crossing of the Delaware River, not far North of Philadelphia, and captured the Trenton garrison by surprise. Soon afterwards his Army won a battle from the British at nearby Princeton, New Jersey, before going into Winter quarters. The captured Hessians were imprisoned mainly in Pennsylvania Dutch cities.

In the following year (1777) another British Army sailed up Chesapeake Bay, landed at the head of the Bay and marched on Philadelphia. Washington's Army was defeated at Chadd's Ford on Brandywine Creek on September 11th, and the British Army occupied Philadelphia. The British again defeated the Continental Army at Germantown on October 4th when Washington attempted to surprise them.

About the same time that the British were occupying Philadelphia, another Continental Army, under the immediate command of General Horatio Gates, defeated General Burgoyne's British Army and obtained complete and unconditional surrender. That Army had sought to invade the Colonies from Canada via Lake Champlain and unite with a British Army coming up to meet it from New York, thus cutting the Colonies in half. The British commander at New York failed to carry out his part of the assignment. Burgoyne's surrender is generally considered to have been the turning-point of the war. A great deal of fighting in various parts of New York, extending even into Vermont, preceded Burgoyne's defeat, but this is not the place to give details, since it is Pennsylvania history with which we are concerned primarily.

Benjamin Franklin and two other Commissioners had been sent by the Continental Congress to Paris to try to obtain greater military assistance from France. Previously the French had secretly provided some assistance, but it was not enough. The victory at Saratoga helped achieve the Commissioners' goal. The French then sent a fleet of naval vessels, with an Army, to assist the Colonies, and openly espoused their independence.

The Winter of 1777/8 for the Army at Valley Forge, with shortages of food and clothing, was the worst Winter of the War. Supply support was later improved, but it was always deficient, due to a lack of adequate organization for supply and inadequate financing of the war. The difficulties were not so much due to a lack of food and clothing in the Colonies. Later stepped-up materiel assistance from France also contributed greatly to winning the war.

Upon the approach of the British to Philadelphia, the Continental Congress moved to York in the Pennsylvania Dutch country. They remained there about a year until they were able to return to Philadelphia after evacuation of the British. The British departed in the Spring of 1778 to return to New York, upon threat of a blockade of Delaware Bay by a French fleet. Washington followed the retreat of the British part way across New Jersey and attacked them at Monmouth Courthouse, but the result was inconclusive.

Thereafter the main action turned to an invasion of the South by another British Army and its ultimate surrender at Yorktown, Virginia on October 19, 1781. A French fleet and a French Army, assisting the Continental Army, provided the vital means of forcing the surrender. That action marked the end of the war, but it was 1783 before a Peace Treaty was concluded, granting the Colonies their independence. Benjamin Franklin was one of the four commissioners who represented the Continental Congress in the treaty negotiations.

During the later years of the War, the military action on Pennsylvania soil consisted in local raids by Indians and Tory sympathizers from New York, primarily in the Wyoming Valley, near the Northern Branch of the Susquehanna River.

Pennsylvania made great contributions to the winning of the war, and its people suffered accordingly. It provided regiments for the regular Continental Army from the beginning at Bunker Hill, and additional militia battalions when Pennsylvania was threatened with invasion. It also provided guns and ammunition, clothing, horses and wagons, and especially food from its bountiful farms. It is noteworthy that the Pennsylvania long-rifle, produced in the Pennsylvania Dutch country from German patterns, was the most advanced infantry weapon of its day from the standpoint of distance and accuracy of its bullets. A number of Continental regiments of riflemen were equipped with those weapons, but the rifles were not available in numbers to equip the entire Army, if there had been a desire to do so. The Pennsylvania Dutch participated fully in all respects to the winning of the war, especially in products of their farms, but as might be expected, they did not contribute as much to leadership as did the English-speaking people, and doubtless for that reason their contributions have not been well-remembered in history. There was little trouble with Tory supporters of the British in Pennsylvania, as compared with New York State. However, there were many Quakers, Mennonites, and Amish who did not believe in fighting; they assisted in the winning of the war in peaceful ways.

After independence was gained, the seat of government of the new United States was removed from Philadelphia to Princeton, New Jersey and elsewhere. For five years from 1785 to 1790, it was located in New York City. However, in 1787 Philadelphia was the location of the Convention which developed our permanent Constitution for a stronger central government. And in 1790 the seat of the new Government, with George Washington as first President, was returned to Philadelphia for ten years while a new Federal city was built in Maryland on the banks of the Potomac River. Pennsylvania was one of the first states to ratify the new Constitution, while the other large states wrangled long and furiously before they ratified it.

About the same time that the seat of the Federal Government was transferred to Washington, D. C., the seat of the State Government was transferred to Lancaster in in the Pennsylvania Dutch country. Not long afterwards, in 1812, the seat of the State Government was settled permanently in Harrisburg on the East bank of the Susquehanna River. Harrisburg was then only a town of 2,500 population at the site of a river ferry in the Pennsylvania Dutch country. It is a beautiful site.

After the Revolutionary War, the area West of the Allegheny Mountains was settled, and Pennsylvania furnished its share of emigrants to Ohio and the rest of the Northwest Territory, and later to the other territories in the Great West.

Pennsylvania had great mineral resources -- more than any of the other original states -- and that made up for the relative scarcity of good farmland in the mountains and Western part of the State. During the Industrial Revolution, Pennsylvania became one of the foremost industrial states, utilizing effectively its coal, limestone, iron ore, and oil and gas. Many large industrial cities were created. Railroads were built rapidly to supply the needs for transportation. No satisfactory systems of water transportation within the State were possible. Philadelphia, a great seaport, and Pittsburgh, at the head of navigation on the Ohio River, had been connected by a road system, but horses and wagons were slow and could not carry heavy-enough loads. Eventually New York City surpassed Philadelphia as a seaport, because of superior advantages; the Ohio River declined in importance in inland transportation; iron-ore deposits and oil pools were largely consumed; but other industries continued to thrive.

With the development of the West, the center of agriculture moved West, and the arts of farming changed greatly, resulting in a decrease in manpower required on the farm and an increase in the size of the farm unit for the purpose of economical operation. These changes and industrialization of the Nation required people to leave farms and go to the cities where there were needs and opportunities for additional people. Adapting to these changes brought many problems to the people of Pennsylvania, as well as elsewhere.

MORE ON THE PENNSYLVANIA DUTCH

Today the meaning of the term "Pennsylvania Dutch" is not generally well-understood outside of Pennsylvania, because the meaning of the word "Dutch" has changed since the time it was first used. Today the term "Pennsylvania German" is more meaningful to most people to indicate the origin of those European immigrants who came in large numbers to Pennsylvania in the 18th century (although it is not accurate). At that time, the word "Dutch" meant anybody who spoke the German language; that word was correctly used, because the German word for "German" was (and still is) "Deutsch". Subsequently the English use of the word "Dutch" was restricted to apply only to natives of the Netherlands (or Holland) -- a very small part of the German people. Subsequently also, the English word "German" was applied to natives of Germany (a nation that did not exist in the 18th century); not all German-speaking people live in Germany or came from there. Because of this confusion, immigrants from the Netherlands have been called "Hollanders" in some areas where there are both Pennsylvania Dutch and Holland Dutch, such as in Southern Michigan.

In Colonial times, New York was the only Colony which had a considerable number of Hollanders. They were the first white settlers when the Colony was established by the Netherlands, and they remained after Great Britain acquired the Colony. New York also had German settlers from the Rhineland. The English settlers in New York called the German settlers "Palatines", "High Dutch", and "German", and the settlers from the Netherlands, "Hollanders" and "Low Dutch", when they chose to distinguish them apart, although sometimes they simply called all of them "Dutch". The terms "High Dutch" and "Low Dutch" corresponded to the terms "High German" and "Low German" which were used to describe the two basic dialects of the German language then in use in Europe. "Low German" was applied to the dialects spoken in the Low Countries - - the Netherlands, Belgium, and other Northern German States. "High German" was applied to the dialects spoken in the Southern and Middle German States - - they were on higher ground. "High" and "Low" had nothing to do with social status among those who spoke German dialects. In modern Germany and Austria, High German is the official language, although there are still many different dialects in use in different parts of those countries. The Netherlands has its own language, although it is still much like the German language. Switzerland uses both High German and French.

It should be understood that the terms, "Pennsylvania Dutch" and "Pennsylvania German", include all persons of European origin whose immigrant ancestors spoke one of the dialects of the German language when they came to Pennsylvania. Their geographic origin included not only the area now generally known as Germany, but also Switzerland, Alsace (now in Eastern France), and the Netherlands. At that time the area now known as Germany was composed of many small independent states. The names and locations of the states from which came most of the Pennsylvania Dutch are shown in the map on page 57. After the unification of the German States under the leadership of Prussia in 1871, the English use of the word "German" was restricted to natives of the German Empire and, since World War I, the successor nations; this meaning is too restrictive to correctly indicate the geographic origin of all of the Pennsylvania Dutch. Hence, even the term "Pennsylvania German" requires special definition in order to avoid confusion as to its meaning.

All of the first German settlers in Pennsylvania were generally called "Palatines", because so many of them came from the Palatinate in the Rhineland. In a short time, the use of that term was abandoned in Pennsylvania, because it was too restrictive as to geographic origin. However, the term continued to be used in New York, where it was more accurate.

All Pennsylvania Dutch settlers were Protestants. The majority were members of the Lutheran or Reformed Churches, but there were also some Moravians and many members of more radical and pious creeds who collectively called themselves "The Plain People" - - they included Mennonites, Amish (a branch of the Mennonites), Dunkers or Dunkards (German Baptist Brethren), and Schwenkfelders. There were also a few French Huguenots (French Reformed Church) among them; they were not necessarily of German descent, but many spoke the German language, having lived in German States for sometime after fleeing from persecution in France.

The first German immigrants in the Pennsylvania Colony after William Penn acquired it were thirteen families of Mennonites sent out by a company in Frankfurt in 1683. Later that company sent additional families and received an additional grant of land. The first settlement was in Germantown, which is now a suburb of Philadelphia; a later settlement was in the region called "Falckner's Swamp" in Montgomery County. Good reports by two of the Mennonites' leaders, Franz Josef Pastorius and Daniel Falckner, were influential in persuading other Germans in the Rhineland to emigrate to Pennsylvania.

In the year 1709 there occurred an extraordinary mass-exodus of German families from the Palatinate and neighboring districts in the Rhineland. More than 13,000 Germans made the long voyage down the Rhine to Rotterdam, and many more would have followed them if the British had not taken steps to stop the flow at the source. While agents of William Penn, and also of the Proprietors of the Carolina Colonies, had solicited German immigrants for a period of several years, nothing like this had happened before, and it was entirely unexpected. No arrangements had been made for their transportation. It happened that the British had landed many troops in Holland that Summer to fight under the Duke of Marlborough against the French in the War of the Spanish Succession. The troop ships were used to transport the Germans to England, to the great relief of the Netherlands, which had been providing food and other assistance to them.

In England these refugees were quartered in a temporary settlement near London, and they were supported by the Government and religious charities until plans were made to settle them in British possessions. Queen Anne was most sympathetic with the plight of the poor Palatines, and she did all that she could for them. It took more than a year to dispose of them. First, all of the many Catholics were returned to their homeland; Great Britain wanted only Protestant immigrants. Likewise, many others who were disillusioned and desired to return home, were sent back. Strangely very few, if any, were sent to Pennsylvania; apparently William Penn's fortunes were at a low ebb at that time. About 3,000 were sent to the New York Colony; about 600 were sent to North Carolina; some were sent to the West Indies; and many were sent to Ireland.

Governor Hunter of the New York Colony personally undertook a project for profit to produce tar and other naval stores from pine trees for the British Government. He obtained Palatines from the Government for laborers on this project, but they considered that it was only a stepping-stone to having their own farms. They must have suffered terribly during the voyage to America, because almost one-fourth of them died enroute or shortly after they arrived in New York. Approximately 400 widows and old people were left in New York City; the remainder were sent to the area of Neuberg (now Newburgh) on the Hudson River, where the men were required to work in the pine woods.

Governor Hunter's resources were insufficient to maintain the Palatines during the development period before the project would be self-supporting. As a result, in 1712 they were starving and sought to acquire their own land and commence farming to support themselves. Beginning in that year, despite the objections of Governor Hunter, some Palatines became farm-tenants along the Hudson, and others went to the Schoharie Valley, which is West of Albany. There they purchased virgin land direct from the Indians. Unfortunately the same land had been sold previously by the Indians to rich English and Holland-Dutch landowners; at least that was alleged subsequently and legally established. The landowners then offered to let the Palatines continue to occupy and farm on rental the land they already occupied and thought they owned. This situation was consistent with the European feudalistic system of land-tenure common in the New York Colony - a system which was protected by the power-structure of the Colony.

The Schoharie Palatines believed that they were victims of a conspiracy to defraud and exploit them, in which Governor Hunter was involved, similar to the manner in which they had been exploited in the Old Country. Some became tenants but, at the invitation of Governor Keith of Pennsylvania, about 60 families went to Pennsylvania, beginning in 1723. They went overland a short distance to Lake Otsego, which is the source of the North Branch of the Susquehanna River (at the subsequent site of Cooperstown). There they built canoes, in which they floated down the Susquehanna to near the site of the later city of Harrisburg, where they ascended Swatara Creek to the area of the Tulpehocken Settlement, which had just been started by the Pennsylvania Dutch on the Tulpehocken Creek, a small tributary of the Schuylkill River in what is now Western Berks County.

Among the emigrants from the New York Colony was Conrad Weiser, who became an important personage in the affairs of the Colony of Pennsylvania. With his father's permission, he had lived for several years with the Mohawk Tribe, like an adopted son of a Chief, and had learned their language and customs. In Pennsylvania, because of that experience, he served for many years as a kind of Indian agent to aid in keeping the peace between the Indians and the settlers; he also assisted the Indians in obtaining more just treatment when they were wronged. The Delaware Indians of that area were under the dominance of the Iroquois Confederation of the New York Colony, which included the Mohawks, and that relationship strengthened Weiser's position.

Some additional Germans, but not many, emigrated to New York. Eventually many of them, including some of the first Palatine immigrants, settled in the Mohawk River Valley (especially in the area of Herkimer and Canajoharie) and in the Cherry Valley to the South of the Mohawk, as well as in the Schoharie Valley. They prospered, eventually acquired their own lands, and made a garden-land of those areas, just as they did in Pennsylvania. But in the Rhineland, New York was not considered a desirable place to go. Nor did the New York authorities solicit more Germans.

After 1710 the flow of immigrants from the Rhineland to America continued at a slow but steady pace. Most of them went to Pennsylvania through the Port of Philadelphia, but some of them went to Maryland, Virginia, and the Carolinas. As related in the brief early history of Pennsylvania, the English-speaking settlers became concerned about this, and as a result, the Colonial Assembly passed a law requiring all foreign immigrants to take an Oath of Fidelity. Colonial records of those Oaths and related passenger lists, beginning in 1727, provide a means of knowing much about the flow of German immigrants into Pennsylvania from that time forward, although they do not disclose the specific places from whence they came.

The records show that approximately 1,250 immigrants arrived in six ships in 1727, and from 300 to 700 in each of the next four years. In 1732 (the year that Balser Bortner and his family came) there were almost 2,000 immigrants in eleven ships. All of those ships were English owned and operated, but they carried the immigrants all the way from Rotterdam, with a stop enroute at an English Channel Port. This was much more convenient for the Germans than embarking for America from an English Port.

By 1727 a system had been developed for German immigration to Pennsylvania as follows: Although the English provided the ships to transport immigrants from Rotterdam to Philadelphia, merchants in Holland would finance passage for those who had insufficient means (most of them), provided they would agree to become indentured servants upon arrival in America. In a few cases, apparently a ship's captain would act as financier, rather than a merchant. Under all such arrangements, a ship's captain would advertise the arrival of his ship in Philadelphia, with descriptions of the servants which were obtainable. Prospective purchasers of those servants would come aboard ship and bargain with them directly, so that the immigrants had some choice of masters, based partly upon what they had to offer. Each purchaser was required to pay the ship's captain for the unpaid transportation charges, and the period of servitude would be proportionate. The typical fare from Rotterdam to Philadelphia was 10 pounds each for persons over age 10, and 5 pounds each for children between 5 and 10 years of age. There was no charge for children under 5. A servant would earn 3 to 4 pounds per year plus clothes and keep; thus it was common for the period of servitude to last three or four years.

In Pennsylvania, indentured servants were generally called "redemptioners", because they had to redeem themselves from servitude by work. As it appears today, a "redemptioner" was much like a slave, although servitude was voluntary in the first place, and lasted only for a limited period. One of the worst features of the system, in the beginning, was that families were sometimes separated. However, there were laws for the protection of both master and servant, and those laws were improved in time to protect against abuses that were found. Ultimately separation of families was forbidden, and a servant was permitted to change masters if he desired. The Proprietors of the Colony allotted additional land to masters for the use of servants, and for some time the Proprietors allotted each servant, upon redemption, 50 acres of land free, except for a quitrent of two shillings per annum. A former servant might also contract to purchase additional land, just like anybody else. Repulsive though this system was, it had advantages. Without it many poor people could not have come to America. Moreover, it provided some incentive to ship captains to operate cleaner and healthier ships in order to collect their fares upon delivery of the passengers in Philadelphia. The system also permitted immigrants time to get accustomed to the ways of the Colony and probably to find a better eventual home. It was said that some Germans became redemptioners only for the latter reasons, when they were able to pay for their transportation. The system was not peculiar to Pennsylvania; it was originated in the Virginia Colony and apparently was used in the Southern Colonies.

The merchant-brokers in Holland who financed ship transportation, sent agents among the people in the Rhineland to induce them to emigrate. Many of those agents were German immigrants to America who had returned (generally failures); they were called "Neulanders". Many carried gold watches with large gold chains to impress the peasants with the wealth which might be obtained by going to America. Government authorities in the German States called them "slave dealers" and "sellers of souls", and would put them in jail if they caught them.

Other means were also used by the German State authorities to discourage loss of their citizens, including publication of scare-stories on the hardships of going to America, depriving emigrants of any right to inheritance of property in their mother-country, taxing emigrants as much as 10% of the value of their personal property (including cash) that they took with them, and making it a felony for anybody to purchase property from one who is going to leave the country. Also peasants were required to obtain certificates of manumission from vassalage, without which they might be stopped anywhere along the Rhine and returned to their liege-masters, like runaway slaves from the South at a later day in America. However, it appears that giving such certificates was required, if requested, and that payment of the related tax was generally excused if one was poor. Although most emigrants were peasant farmers, some were free men - - principally artisans.

A German family going to Pennsylvania from the Rhineland had to travel from its home to Rotterdam by barge on the Rhine River, and perhaps also on one of its tributaries, such as the Neckar, Main, or Moselle Rivers. Then, just as today, Rotterdam in the Netherlands, at the mouth of the Rhine, was a great ocean port and terminal for river traffic to and from much of Central Europe, but unlike today, it was necessary to use the rivers to transport people, as well as goods. Barge transportation was slow, not only because they did not have steam or diesel power, but also because the Rhine boats were required to stop for customs examinations and payment of tolls at more than thirty points, because of the multiplicity of independent states along the river. Boats were often detained to suit the convenience of the customs inspectors, and perhaps to require the passengers to spend money locally for necessities. But it has also been said that the emigrants were given food and drink as a charity at some places. This explains why a trip down the Rhine to Rotterdam required four to six weeks. It was said that the cost of the trip averaged about $35 per person in our money. In consequence, many a family spent much of its limited resources just to get to Rotterdam. And then emigrants might be detained in the Netherlands as much as five or six weeks, at great expense, before a ship was ready to sail from Rotterdam.

One Gottlieb Mittelberger, a native of Wurtemberg, who went to Pennsylvania and returned disillusioned, was the author of a detailed description of his experiences. He wrote with a sour attitude, and perhaps he exaggerated a little. His work provided much of the information used in preparing the foregoing statement regarding the Rhine journey and the following statement regarding the ocean voyage to America.

Aboard ship, people were packed like herrings; each person was given a space of only two feet by six feet in a bedstead, in a large cabin or hold of the ship. Eight days to four weeks, depending upon the wind, was required for the voyage to the English Channel port of Cowes, where there was another customs inspection and payment of tolls; that might require another week or two. After leaving Cowes the real misery began. It took from seven to twelve weeks more to reach Philadelphia, also depending upon the winds. They lived in misery from the results of crowding, as well as from seasickness, bad food, and foul water. The art of food preservation was then most primitive; salt was a common means of preserving meat, and only certain foods could be kept for any length of time. Lice and filth were everywhere. There was much dysentery, constipation, vomiting and fever; many had boils and scurvy. Communicable diseases often broke out. In the cramped quarters there was a constant stench, and the passengers were exposed to the spread of disease by having to breathe the foul air exhaled by everybody. There were periods of heat, but also periods of coldness and wetness, especially at night. Misery was climaxed during gales which lasted two or three days. Then midst the howling of the gale, the noise of waves breaking over the ship, and the groaning and creaking of the ship's timbers as the ship plunged, pitched and rolled, many cried out or whimpered piteously night and day, in fear for the safety of the ship and their lives, as well as in misery from sickness and suffering from being cold and wet. Some died and many were in bad condition when the ship reached Philadelphia.

It has been reported that immigrants were sometimes not permitted to bring the chests of their possessions aboard ship (or not all of them), because of lack of space. Sometimes they had to leave their chests in Holland; sometimes the chests were transported on another ship; and when chests were brought on the same ship, they were stored in another place on the ship. In any case they might never see those possessions again. Members of the ship's crew often broke into the passengers' chests and took what they wanted. The owners got no satisfaction by complaining to the ship's captain.

Because of time requirements and the weather, ship voyages with immigrants were made generally during the Summer months, with arrivals in Philadelphia from August to October. And this meant that the immigrants would have been required to leave home several months before their arrival.

In our time, we can only stand in awe and admiration for the fortitude, strength, and endurance of our forefathers who came to America. Perhaps if they had understood in advance the true extent of their ordeal, many would have decided against leaving their homeland in quest of improving their lot in a land about which they knew very little. This should be an inspiration to their descendants to aid in surmounting their much smaller difficulties. None of us are required to endure so much.

There were good reasons why the Germans were impelled to flee from their homeland in large numbers in the 18th century. In general, they desired to escape the conditions under which they lived. Peasants were like permanent tenant-farmers, in that they had to pay rent for their farms and could not become land-owners. In addition, they had to contribute military and personal services to their landlords and princes. And they were heavily taxed to support their princes in luxury. Taxes were also used to support a favored State religion, which may have been some other than their own religion. Each head-of-state could select the official religion for that state, and changes were sometimes made, including especially changes from Lutheran or Reformed to Catholic. Although, contrary to the situation in France, there was a theoretical right to individual choice of religion and there was no cruel persecution of the unorthodox, there was some discrimination against persons having contrary religions (such as taxes to support the favored religion), and there was sometimes appropriation of property of the unfavored churches. Worst of all was the cruel suffering by the people during the frequent terrible wars during the 17th and early 18th centuries. The Thirty Years' War (1618 to 1648) was a religious civil-war between the German States, including Austria (Catholics vs. Protestants) in which one side or the other was at one time aided by outsiders, including France, Denmark, and Sweden; that war was the worst in the history of civilization. From time to time there were later invasions by French armies of the territories of their weak German neighbors. During the period 1701 to 1714, the German states in the Rhineland were again ravaged by the French in the War of the Spanish Succession. Armies of both sides lived off the land, and they plundered, pillaged, and burned property, and murdered, raped, and extorted money from the inhabitants. The Palatinate, in particular, suffered in all of those wars, especially the part on the West side of the Rhine, which was nearest to the French. The Palatinate was the richest agricultural region in Central Europe; it was a source of support for friendly as well as enemy armies, and a target for destruction by enemy armies. Consequently the poor people of the Rhineland were greatly attracted by the promises of freedom, peace, and economic opportunity in America, especially in the Pennsylvania Colony - - promises, which by all reports from there, were beginning to be fulfilled. The origin and meaning of the causes of discontent in the Rhineland will be illuminated more in a later section on the background of German history.

The original Pennsylvania Dutch country was in the present Montgomery, Lehigh, Berks, Lebanon, and Lancaster Counties. As the population of that area became saturated, the Pennsylvania Dutch spread into adjoining counties, including particularly the present Northampton, Carbon, Luzerne, Schuylkill, Dauphin, Northumberland, Montour, Columbia, Union, Snyder, Centre, Perry, Juniata, Mifflin, Cumberland, York, Adams, Franklin, and Huntingdon Counties, where they represented a large portion of the population. These areas are shown in the map on page 56.

Beginning even before the Revolutionary War, the Pennsylvania Dutch overflowed into Maryland and Virginia, down the Great Valley on the Eastern side of the Appalachian Mountains - - the Cumberland Valley in Pennsylvania and Maryland - - the Shenandoah Valley in Virginia. They comprised a majority of the population of those areas. Those areas were also very fertile. Altogether, the Pennsylvania Dutch acquired much of the best agricultural land in the Colonies East of the mountains; they knew how to select it.

As previously stated in the background of early Pennsylvania history, it was estimated by several authorities that Germans comprised about one-third of the total population of Pennsylvania at different dates from 1750 to 1776. The total estimated population of Pennsylvania in 1776, about the time of the beginning of the Revolutionary War, was 160,000. During the war, immigration practically ceased.

After the Revolutionary War some Hessian soldiers who had fought for the British remained in the Colonies. It has been estimated that of 30,000 total Hessian soldiers, about 5,000 did not return to their homeland; therefore, 5,000 should be the maximum number who might have remained in the Colonies. Hessians captured at Trenton and Saratoga were confined in prison-camps in the Pennsylvania Dutch country, in or near Reading, Lancaster, and York in Pennsylvania; Frederick, Maryland; and Winchester, Virginia; where their Pennsylvania Dutch guards spoke their language. Those who remained in America probably sought anonymity by becoming absorbed among the Germans in Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and the Carolinas, because they were disliked and scorned by Americans for their having fought for the enemy, although they, as individuals, were not responsible for that; they had been compelled to do it by their rulers. It is said that even the Pennsylvania Dutch disliked them. Even if 5,000 Hessians settled among the Pennsylvania Dutch, they were relatively few in relation to those who had come before the war plus their descendants. Otherwise, the input of German immigrants into the Pennsylvania Dutch population is considered to have ended in the 18th century. Subsequent German immigrants generally by-passed the Pennsylvania Dutch country where land had become too high-priced for new immigrants.

After the Revolutionary War, many Pennsylvania Dutch crossed the Allegheny Mountains into Western Pennsylvania, and they composed a proportionate part of the hordes who emigrated farther West during the 19th century. As a result, today there are many more persons having Pennsylvania Dutch blood (at least in part) outside Pennsylvania than inside. It was a general rule that emigrants who went West generally held to approximately the same lines of latitude as the places from which they came. Therefore, as might be expected, today persons of Pennsylvania Dutch descent comprise a high proportion of the population of Northern Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, Southern Michigan, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado.

Some appreciation of the extent of population increase in the United States of persons of Pennsylvania Dutch descent may be gained by considering the increase in the Bortner family as indicated in the genealogical registers in this work. The rate of increase was doubtless typical of all the Pennsylvania Dutch.

Additional German immigration into the United States in the 19th century flowed most heavily into the Middle West. Immigration data indicates that 6,845,000 German immigrants entered the United States from 1820 to 1965; this was about 16% of total immigrants for the period - - the largest ratio for Nationals of any country. And that excludes German-speaking persons from other nations, such as Austria, Switzerland, the Netherlands, France, and Belgium.

Dr. A. B. Faust in his work, "The German element in the United States", estimated that approximately 28% of the white population of the entire United States in 1900 had German blood, and gave statistical evidence to support that estimate. If that was true in 1900, it probably is still true. But this includes descendants of 19th century German immigrants as well as the Pennsylvania Dutch - - one group may be as numerous as the other.

United States historians have slighted or unfairly treated the subject of German participation in the making of the Nation, probably because most historians have been New Englanders, and they have been notoriously provincial. This is partially illustrated in the following single statement from Parkman's monumental history of the struggle between France and England in the New World:

"The essential antagonism of Virginia and New England was afterwards to become, and to remain for a century, an element of the first influence in American history. Each might have learned much from the other; but neither did so till, at last, the strife of their contending principles shook the continent. (Meaning the Civil War.) Pennsylvania differed widely from both. She was a conglomerate of creeds and races, - English, Irish, Germans, Dutch, and Swedes; Quakers, Lutherans, Presbyterians, Romanists, Moravians, and a variety of nondescript sects. The Quakers prevailed in the eastern districts; quiet, industrious, virtuous, and serenely obstinate. The Germans were strongest towards the centre of the colony, and were chiefly peasants; successful farmers, but dull, ignorant, and superstitious. Towards the west were the Irish of whom some were Celts, always quarreling with their German neighbors who detested them; but the greater part were Protestants of Scotch descent, from Ulster; a vigorous border population. Virginia and New England had each a strong distinctive character. Pennsylvania, with her heterogeneous population, had none but what she owed to the sober neutral tints of Quaker existence. A more thriving colony there was not on the continent. Life, if monotonous, was smooth and contented. Trade and the arts grew. Philadelphia, next to Boston, was the largest town in British America; and was moreover, the intellectual centre of the middle and southern colonies. Unfortunately, for her credit in the approaching war (meaning the final French and Indian War) the Quaker influence made Pennsylvania non-combatant. Politically, too, she was an anomaly; for, though utterly unfeudal in disposition and character, she was under feudal superiors in the persons of the representatives of William Penn, the original grantee."

Since the Pennsylvania Dutch retained their customs, language, and religions, and settled in communities of their own kind, they were looked upon by some of their English-speaking neighbors with contempt, mixed with fear. It was fear that led to the laws requiring all foreigners to take Oaths of Fidelity and Abjuration. Benjamin Franklin once called them stupid, and he deplored their continuance in using the German language, as follows: "Few of their children know English. They import many books from Germany, and of the six printing houses in the province, two are entirely German; two half-German, half-English; and but two are entirely English". Note, however, that the facts cited tend to show that the Pennsylvania Dutch were at least as literate as the English-speaking Pennsylvanians.

It has always been true that minorities who are different, whether in nationality, race, or religious creed, are looked down upon, or even hated, by the majority. And the Pennsylvania Dutch were a minority, although a large one - - in nationality, language, and religious creed, although not in race. The Anglo-Saxons from England were primarily German in their racial origin, and the English language belongs to the Germanic family of languages. Actually also, the several German religious creeds had their counterparts among the various creeds of the English and Scotch-Irish - - all were Protestant, all were Christian.

A typical English provincial's first reaction to the Pennsylvania Dutch is contained in the following excerpt from the young George Washington's journal in 1748, when he surveyed land in the Shenandoah Valley, near Winchester, for Lord Fairfax, the Proprietor: "I really think they (meaning the German settlers he found there) seemed to be as ignorant a set of people as the Indians. They would never speak English but, when spoken to, they speak all Dutch".

To set the record straight, around the beginning of the present century, The Pennsylvania German Society began to publish books, containing both modern and colonial writings, concerning the Pennsylvania Dutch, whom they preferred to call German. And a few historians and other authors have undertaken to fill the need for information on the Pennsylvania Dutch. Yet it is still true that one must go to specialized works to obtain such information.

Actually there were few observers of the Pennsylvania Dutch in colonial times who reported their observations. The principal one was Dr. Benjamin Rush, the leading physician and surgeon in Philadelphia during the Revolutionary War period and immediately thereafter. He was not of German descent. Much, but not all, of the following information is taken from his essay, written in 1789, "Account of the Manners of the German Inhabitants in Pennsylvania".

Dr. Rush acknowledged that the general prosperity of Pennsylvania in his time was largely due to the productivity of Pennsylvania Dutch agriculture. He observed that most of their farms clearly showed prosperity and superiority to other farms. He noted that the Germans generally settled on good land, particularly in limestone areas. Their land was generally wooded originally, but they thoroughly cleared the parts they desired for pastures and cultivation. They not only cut down the trees, but they removed all the stumps and grubbed out the roots, so that they would not damage their plow-points. Most other settlers of the time did not remove the stumps and roots, but left them to decay; many did not even fell the trees, but killed them by girdling - - they had to plow and cultivate around the trees or stumps. German farmers generally had well-fenced fields and pastures (presumably rail fences), contrary to general colonial practice, so that the livestock could not get at the growing crops, but were confined to their pastures. They economized in the use of wood; for example, they already used stoves for room-heating rather than the more wasteful fireplaces which were commonly used. They also retained and efficiently maintained sufficient woodland for future use; they did not attempt to cultivate all the land.

A good barn came before a good house. The original houses were built of logs, which were generally cut square, at least on the ends, where they were carefully mortised into the ends of the logs of the adjoining walls. Spaces between logs were filled with straw and mortar. In some cases the barn was in the same building as the first house. Building a permanent house was left to the next generation, and then stone or brick was the most favored material.

Houses were plainly and even roughly furnished, following the peasant practices in the homeland. Sawbuck tables and square-plank-back chairs were used. Wooden chests, comparable in size to modern cedar chests, were in general use for personal belongings; often they had colorful folk-art designs painted on them. Plain wood bed-frames were covered by feather beds, and surprisingly, light feather beds were used as bed coverings rather than quilted comforters - - they were warm, but it is a mystery how they kept their feet covered at the bottom of the bed. Less crude furniture was used in later years.

The Germans owned livestock of all kinds and early favored horses over oxen for draft purposes. Local German wagonmakers built fine wagons. Most farmers owned a fair-sized wagon which required four horses to pull it, for carrying farm products to market over the rough dirt roads. These wagons generally had white linen covers spread over half-hoops above the wagon-top. A fine breed of draft horses, known as the Conestoga (now extinct) was developed. Larger covered wagons, requiring more than four horses were also developed for carrying freight long distances; these were also called "Conestoga". They had a sag in the middle to prevent the freight from shifting when the wagon went up- or down-hill. Wagons were brightly painted - - generally the bodies were Prussian blue, the undercarriages and wheels were vermillion.

The Germans fed their animals well and did not overwork them. In cold weather they sheltered them in warm barns, not only for humane reasons, but also because the animals would not consume so much feed to keep warm. They developed the bank barn; it was commonly a large barn, built into the side of a hill, with two floors - - the lower floor for the animals; the upper floor for hay, straw, and grain, into which they could drive their loaded wagons at ground level for unloading. When no hill was available, an earthen ramp was built up to the second floor. Brick and stone, as well as lumber, were used in barn construction; often composite. More extensive use of lumber was made in later years. These barns were often decorated with colorful folk-art designs, known as hex-signs; originally it was thought that such signs brought good-luck, or possibly they might keep evil spirits away.

They raised wheat, rye, oats, barley, buckwheat, Indian corn, sorghum, meadow grass, red clover, flax, and hemp, and they had fruit orchards and kitchen gardens. They were well in advance of the other colonial farmers in horticulture. Bee colonies were maintained by some for the production of honey. Wheat was their principal cash crop. By 1750, Pennsylvania exported a great deal of wheat, wheat-flour, and some Indian corn, practically all produced by the Pennsylvania Dutch.

Farm families ate sparingly of meat (principally boiled), used rye flour and corn meal for breads (more than wheat flour), and they consumed large quantities of vegetables and fruits, especially cabbage, potatoes, onions, and apples. Cabbage was used in several forms - - sauer kraut, cold-slaw, boiled, and fried. Apples were preserved by drying slices (schnitz) and became a unique item of diet, especially in pies and in stew with boiled ham and dumplings. Sorghum molasses was used much in lieu of sugar. And of course, milk, butter, cheese, and eggs were produced and consumed. Dr. Rush was of the opinion that the Germans ate too little meat, and that, as a result, their strength declined earlier in life than men of other nationalities who ate more meat. Perhaps this was true; perhaps not; and if the Germans' strength actually declined earlier than others, perhaps it was because they were more prodigal in the use of their strength when they were young and in the prime of life.

Early Pennsylvania Dutch farmers used implements such as they had used in the homeland - - plows with wood mold-boards, harrows and rakes with wood teeth, sickles for cutting grain, and scythes for cutting hay. However, it was not long before the cradle was used in cutting grain. They flailed grain or tramped on it on a barn floor to thresh it. Like other colonial farmers they were improvident in the use of land; they used new land without replenishment of the elements taken from it, except for nitrogen produced by growing clover, and when exhausted, they let it lie fallow for several years. However, it does not appear that they were behind the general agricultural practices of their time, and it is understood that they improved their practices as they learned about them - - systematic crop rotation, lime and fertilizer, and improved implements, except that some of the Plain People were slow to use certain advanced implements which they thought were contrary to God's Will.

A Pennsylvania Dutch farm was a family farm. Hired labor was seldom used, and of course there was no slave labor such as in the neighboring Maryland and Virginia colonies. In consequence, families were large and everybody worked hard for long hours. The women were called upon for field labor, when necessary, and they were required to maintain the kitchen garden, milk cows, etc. in addition to their normal household duties, including spinning, weaving, and making clothes. The children were taught to love work and to fear God, as a part of their religion, and they had to contribute their labor at an early age. These work habits had been acquired in the old country, where that was required of all peasants in order to survive.

The ordinary clothes of the Pennsylvania Dutch were plain and made of home-spun material - - linen and woolen. In the Summer they did not wear shoes ordinarily. Except for the Plain People, their dress clothes were much fancier, and were often imported from their homeland at considerable expense. Except for the Plain People, they loved color - - bright red, blue, and green in particular. One traveler reported that he saw men going to church in Myerstown, now in Lebanon County, dressed in a Westphalian manner, with green and blue coats, broad-brim hats, and high boots that came above the knee.

The Pennsylvania Dutch generally used wine and beer, for which their taste had been cultivated in the homeland, and also apple cider, but they did not like distilled spirits, and there was little drunkenness. Of course this changed in time as they became Americanized.

They were convivial at Wakes, Weddings, and on New Year's Eve, and this was deplored by the Lutheran patriarch, the Rev. Henry M. Muhlenberg. They observed church holidays quietly, especially Easter and Christmas, but generally observed no other holidays than New Year's Day - - not even Independence Day, which came during the haying season when they were busy. After local militia companies were established, as required by law, they used the annual militia days as festive holidays, as well as for militia drills. Barn raisings, husking bees, schnitz (apple-slicing) parties, and similar work gatherings for mutual assistance, also served as social occasions.

The Pennsylvania Dutch farmers required some services that they could not provide well for themselves, such as provided by millers, tanners, shoemakers, weavers, hatters, cabinet-makers, blacksmiths, wagonmakers, and harness-makers, and those services were provided generally by fellow German artisans. Industry gradually developed in the Pennsylvania Dutch country, including sawmills, iron furnaces and foundries, rifle-makers, potteries, glass-blowers, brick kilns, etc. The principal towns soon became beehives of industry as well as trade, especially Allentown, Bethlehem, Reading, Lebanon, Harrisburg, Lancaster, and York. In time, as farmers were able to sell more of their products, it became possible and economical for them to buy more goods and services and to produce less for their own use.

Dr. Rush made only a few observations regarding German artisans and tradesmen. He noted that mechanics, as well as farmers, aimed to own their homes, and that German merchants were uniformly candid in business-dealings and punctual in meeting their commitments. He noted that all Germans preferred industrious habits to wealth itself, and that they were afraid to go into debt.

Thus it can be appreciated that the Pennsylvania Dutch were most industrious, productive, thrifty, frugal, independent, self-reliant, and honest. In addition, they had the other Christian virtues, including tolerance in particular. We know also that they had the typical German characteristics of cleanliness, orderliness, determination, and obstinacy; and that while they were patient up to a point, they could get extremely angry when pushed. These qualities were what made our country great. They were long generally considered to represent the American ideal. And since the Pennsylvania Dutch had most of these qualities in the highest degree, and since they spread throughout the country, they have most certainly had a great and good influence in molding the American character. If, in the process of becoming Americanized, some of these qualities have become eroded in the Pennsylvania Dutch, as in other Americans, it is to be regretted.

Physically the Pennsylvania Dutch males were described generally as appearing muscular and husky, and the females as appearing plump, rosy-cheeked, and strong. They generally had dark hair of moderate growth, light skins, neutral-colored (hazel) eyes, and were a little shorter than their present-day descendants, but those characteristics were subject to normal deviations.

The spoken language of the Pennsylvania Dutch became altered in time to a special dialect which, while basically High German, contained a mixture of modified German and English words. For many years they resisted efforts by some English-speaking inhabitants of Pennsylvania to induce them to adopt the English language. They liked their own language, especially in their church services. The Quakers, however, were tolerant, and respected their desire to retain their own language and culture. Beginning in the early 19th century, young people asked for the introduction of English into their church services and their schools, and this was gradually done, with declining opposition in each succeeding generation. And as some of them emigrated Westward and lived in mixed communities, they were forced to adopt the use of the English language. There are a few older people still living in the Pennsylvania Dutch country who can still speak the dialect, but it will soon become extinct.

In colonial days most of the Pennsylvania Dutch belonged to the Lutheran and Reformed Churches. Members of both sects got along quite well together. In many places they joined to erect a single Union Church in which services of both were conducted. Generally their respective ministers served more than one congregation. Inter-marriages of Lutheran and Reformed Church members were common, and brought about shifts in church membership, since each new family accepted one sect or the other and did not become divided in religion. Baptisms, weddings, and funerals might be conducted by a minister of either sect for members of either sect, whoever was available at the time. Divorces were abhorred.

Ministers were required to keep records of births, deaths, and marriages for the State, but few such records were filed officially. In some instances, more-or-less complete church or ministerial records have been preserved in archives of County and Church historical societies, but a great many records have been lost. There are more baptism records available than records of marriages and deaths, because baptism was a church sacrament, but weddings and funerals were not. Infant baptism was important to the Pennsylvania Dutch; they thought that by baptism their names were registered in a way that made them known to God. Baptism certificates, artistically and colorfully decorated and lettered (in German), were used and preserved. Old baptism certificates are prized by some in the present day for artistic wall-decoration; it makes no difference that a certificate was not given originally to one's own ancestor, but if it was, it is that much more valuable.

The Lutheran Church in Pennsylvania was supported from the homeland in the beginning, but the Reformed Church got its support from the Netherlands. As a result, the latter did not thrive as well. In later years both the Reformed and Lutheran Churches in America became independent, and the German Reformed Church was separated from the (Holland) Dutch Reformed Church in America. Shortly before 1800, some of the Pennsylvania Dutch, especially members of the Reformed Church, were attracted to and joined certain more emotional new creeds which originated among them - - the United Brethren in Christ and two different Evangelical Churches. The United Brethren have been likened to Methodists, being different originally because of language. Other Pennsylvania Dutch, especially those who went West beyond Ohio, became converted to other established Protestant creeds when there were insufficient members in their respective communities to support a church of the Lutheran or Reformed faith. A few, but not many, were converted to the Quakers. A great many descendants now have no church affiliation.

In recent years there have been significant unions of some of the many splintered Protestant sects, including in particular some of German origin. One of the German Evangelical Churches first united with the German Reformed Church, and the two later united with the Congregational and Christian Churches (of New England origin) to form the United Church of Christ. Another German Evangelical Church first united with the United Brethren in Christ, and they are now in process of uniting with the Methodist Church (of English origin). The Lutheran Church, however, still continues independent and strong, having gained the membership of most of the German immigrants in the 19th century in the Mid-West. Members of none of the above-mentioned churches have been deterred by their religion per se from adapting themselves to general American patterns of living.

The Mennonites and Amish have clung to many of their ancient beliefs and folkways, secular as well as religious, and are well known wherever they have settled by their plain uniform dress, appearance, and customs. Many of them are still concentrated in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, where they continue to make it one of the most productive agricultural counties in America. They have not gained adherents generally, except by birth, and apparently they have had some difficulty in retaining all of their young people. The Church of the Brethren (principal branch of the Dunkers or Dunkards) still exists as a sect faithful to its original religious tenets, but their people have changed their way of life. The Moravians, originally centered in Bethelhem in Lehigh County, Pennsylvania, and never very numerous, also still exist.

Notwithstanding their religion, the Pennsylvania Dutch were originally superstitious and believed in magic, but in this respect they were not much different than most people of their time. Incantations, talismans (such as hex-signs), and ritualistic recipes were considered to be effective in driving away evil spirits and ailments of both man and beast. Formulas for timing planting and harvesting, based upon phases of the moon, were among the most-lasting superstitions.

The early Pennsylvania Dutch believed in only minimal education as might be required for simple occupations. A farmer or carpenter did not need more than reading, writing, and arithmetic, and his wife did not need as much of that as did her husband. It was generally assumed that the children would follow closely in the footsteps of their parents, without trying to reach some higher level. Of course, they believed that more education was required for the professions, but they did not generally consider going into any of the professions, except possibly the ministry. Learning farming, housekeeping, or a trade should be from practice, and not from books, they thought. Character-building and acquiring a philosophy of life was a matter for the home as well as the church. Use of the catechism in church schools for children was universal, with graduation by confirmation of adolescents in church membership. It is suspected that retention of such attitudes towards education in some Pennsylvania Dutch families in the 20th century may have retarded progress of some in the most recent two or three generations in adapting to the rapid changes in American life brought about by changing technology, with reduced needs for farmers and greater needs for technically and professionally trained people in the cities.

Dr. Rush reported that scarcely a German could not read, but many wives and daughters could not write. The number of German publishing houses in Pennsylvania is evidence that the Germans read books. There were also a number of German newspapers for them. Frederick Klees, in his book, "The Pennsylvania Dutch", states that Christopher Sauer's press in Germantown printed the Bible in German in 1743, preceding the first printing of the Bible in English in the Colonies (also in Philadelphia) by thirty-nine years.

Klees also ennumerates the colleges established by the German churches in the Pennsylvania Dutch country, as evidence that higher education was not altogether neglected. They included Franklin and Marshall College, Ursinus College, Cedar Crest, and Hood College (the latter two for women), established by the Reformed Church; Muhlenberg College, Gettysburg College, and Susquehanna University, established by the Lutheran Church; the Moravian College; Lebanon Valley College, established by the United Brethren; and Albright College, established by the Evangelical Church. Other colleges have been established by the same churches in other States. And there are a number of universities and colleges in Pennsylvania, including some in the Pennsylvania Dutch country, established by the State and other churches, which have been attended by Pennsylvania Dutch descendants. The Plain People have remained less convinced of the need for higher education than the rest of the Pennsylvania Dutch. Yet the Dunkards eventually established two colleges in the Pennsylvania Dutch country - - Juniata and Elizabethtown.

The participation of the Pennsylvania Dutch in the Colonial wars and the Revolutionary War has been related in the earlier section concerning early Pennsylvania history, but perhaps it may be of interest to mention some outstanding German personalities in the Revolutionary War.

The most outstanding Pennsylvania German in Washington's Army during the Revolution was the Rev. Peter Muhlenberg of Woodstock, Virginia, a Pennsylvania Dutch community in the Shenandoah Valley. He was the oldest son of the Rev. Henry M. Muhlenberg, the patriarch of the Lutheran Church in Pennsylvania. George Washington knew him, and at an early date during the war, gave him a Colonel's commission in the Continental Army. In his last sermon in Woodstock, he preached on duty to one's country; he concluded: "There is a time for all things - - a time to preach and a time to fight - - and now is the time to fight". Shedding his gown and appearing in uniform, he called for recruits; he enlisted about 300 of his parishoners. He served with distinction in battle, and was made a Brigadier General in 1777, and a Major General near the end of the war. Later he served with distinction in the Pennsylvania State Government and in the United States Congress. His brother, Rev. Frederick A. Muhlenberg, was a delegate to the Continental Congress during part of the war, and later was the first Speaker of the United States House of Representatives.

In his own way, one Christopher Ludwick, a Pennsylvania Dutch baker from Philadelphia, made a big contribution to the Continental Army. He became the Army's "Baker General", and supervised the baking of bread on a huge scale for Washington's entire army, and also for the French Army, as well, at the Siege of Yorktown. He bought most of his wheat or flour direct from the Pennsylvania Dutch.

Molly Pitcher, a legendary, romantic figure in Revolutionary War history, was a Pennsylvania Dutch girl from Carlisle, Pennsylvania. Her maiden name was Mary Ludwig. She followed her husband, John Hays, who was in the artillery in Washington's army, serving as a laundress and helping her husband's unit as best she could. She was nick-named "Molly Pitcher", because she carried water on the battlefield for thirsty soldiers. However, in the Battle of Monmouth (New Jersey) her husband collapsed from heat exhaustion, and she took his place temporarily in serving a cannon, for which she acquired everlasting fame.

Brigadier General Nicholas Herkimer was a German in the Mohawk Valley of New York, but he came from the same stock as the Pennsylvania Dutch. In August, 1777, he led a force of Mohawk Valley militia, composed mainly of Germans, to the relief of Fort Stanwix, near the present city of Rome; it was besieged by a British force, under the command of General Barry Saint Leger, composed of British regulars, American Tories, and their Indian allies. Herkimer's force was ambushed at Oriskany, not far from the fort, and a bloody battle ensued. Herkimer was wounded in the battle and later died of his wounds. The American militia retired from the field at the end of the day, but the losses they had inflicted on the enemy contributed greatly to lifting the siege of the fort and the withdrawal of the British force to Oswego on Lake Ontario (from whence it came), thus preventing it from joining Burgoyne's army, which was invading New York from Canada, and thus also indirectly assisting in Burgoyne's ultimate defeat at Saratoga.

The most famous German in the Continental Army was Major General Friederich Von Steuben. However, he was not an American by prior residence. A Prussian citizen and onetime Captain in the Prussian Army, he succeeded in obtaining an appointment by the Continental Congress as Inspector General of the Continental Army, with the rank of Major General. This appointment was made upon the basis of misrepresentation that he had been a Lieutenant General in the Prussian Army. General Washington would not accept his presence as Inspector General, which he regarded as spying upon him; and he effectively thwarted that function by giving the Baron the job of training soldiers. He was a good drill-master. Later Washington gave him command of a division, where he served effectively under the French General, the Marquis de Lafayette, in Virginia. After the war, New York State gave him a 16,000-acre domain in the Mohawk Valley.

(Mad) Anthony Wayne, whose mother was Pennsylvania Dutch and father was Scotch-Irish, was a Brigadier General in the Continental Army. During most of the Revolutionary War, he commanded a brigade of Pennsylvania regiments, known as the Pennsylvania Line. He was brave and daring, even reckless. He won distinction in battle, most notably in the storming and capture of Stony Point on the Hudson River. Several years after the war, in 1791, President Washington recalled him to lead a force against the Indians in Ohio. He defeated them in the Battle of Fallen Timbers on the bank of the Maumee River (south of the present city of Toledo a few miles) and forced them, in the Treaty of Greenville, to give up most of Ohio. He died in Detroit after taking possession of the forts in the Northwest Territory that the British had continued to hold until that time, contrary to the peace treaty that they had signed at the close of the Revolutionary War.

It may be of additional interest to name some other Americans of German descent who have helped make this country. This will show that German descendants have shared in the American ideal that anybody can get to the top if he has the ability and character, regardless of his initial station in life or his ancestors' station - - quite different from the situation in Europe for so many years.

Obtaining the Presidency of the United States is the greatest dream of any ambitious American. The last two Republican Presidents have been of Pennsylvania Dutch descent - - Herbert C. Hoover and Dwight D. Eisenhower. And the Roosevelts were descended from Holland Dutch ancestors in New York State. Altogether, Presidents of German-American descent have been in the White House for 32 years of the first 60 years of the 20th century.

Turning to our military leaders, we find that our top General in Europe in both World Wars was of Pennsylvania Dutch descent - - John J. Pershing and Dwight D. Eisenhower. Pershing's top commander in the field in World War I was General Hunter Liggett, of Pennsylvania Dutch descent. In World War II, other top Generals of Pennsylvania Dutch descent included: Henry H. Arnold, Chief of U. S. Army Air Corps; Carl A. Spaatz, Chief of U. S. Strategic Air Force in Europe (afterwards Chief of Staff of the U. S. Air Force); Jacob L. Devers, Commander of 6th (Southern) Group of Armies in Europe; and Robert L. Eichelberger, Commander, 8th Army in the Pacific. Other top officers of German descent in World War II included: Admiral Chester W. Nimitz, U. S. Navy Commander in Chief in the Pacific; Admiral Marc A. Mitscher, Commander of the famous Carrier Task Force 58; and General Walter Krueger, Commander, 6th Army in the Pacific.

Turning to industry and commerce, top leaders in their time have included the following Americans of German descent:

John Jacob Astor came to New York City penniless from the southern Rhineland in 1784. He became a fur merchant and later a fur trader. While still young, he founded and operated a great fur-trading business with the Indians and mountain men in the great northwestern wilderness, and a shipping and trading business with the orient. He invested wisely in New York real estate and was the richest man in America when he died.

Cornelius (Commodore) Vanderbilt, descendant of a Holland Dutch pioneer (van der Bilt) on Staten Island, N. Y., started with a small ferry to Manhattan about 1810. This grew into a large New York ferry business, then a Hudson-River shipping line, and eventually an ocean shipping line. Ultimately he became a capitalist with a special interest in railroads. He acquired control of the New York Central Railroad, became its President, and caused its extension westward to Chicago. His fortune was the largest of his time, rivaled only by the lesser Astor fortune.

John D. Rockefeller, descendant of New York German pioneers, went into the oil business in a small way in Cleveland, when that business was in its infancy. Forseeing its potentiality, he progressively expanded, especially by acquiring competing businesses, until eventually he built the Standard Oil Trust which threatened to be a national monopoly. His methods of destroying and undercutting competition (which were also used by others in that period) resulted in the development of laws and regulation of industry, transportation, and trade to try to prevent monopolies and preserve competition, in the public interest. The Standard Oil Trust was required to dissolve. Rockefeller became the first billionaire. His fortune, like that of many other wealthy men, was used in part for philanthropy. He was the grandfather of Nelson Rockefeller, present Governor of New York State, and David Rockefeller, President of the Chase Manhattan Bank.

George Westinghouse, descendant of an early German immigrant in Massachusetts, was one of America's greatest inventors and industrial geniuses. He established Westinghouse Airbrake and Westinghouse Electric in Pittsburgh, based upon profits from his inventions, but his greatest monument is the alternating electric-current system (now in almost universal use), which enables long-distance transmission of electric energy and more economical use of electric current; in accomplishing this, he had to defeat Thomas A. Edison, who advocated use of the direct current system that he had pioneered.

The Studebaker brothers were early Pennsylvania Dutch carriage- and wagon-makers who moved their business to South Bend, Indiana at an early day. Their business became one of the largest of its kind, and their products the best. When their business declined, with introduction of automobiles, they established an automobile manufacturing business that grew and operated successfully for many years, before it closed recently under pressure of competition. However, the Studebaker Corporation still manufactures a number of other products.

Henry Ford, whose mother was Pennsylvania Dutch, was the inventor of the first low-priced automobile, and the founder of the automobile business which bears his name. He pioneered mass-production techniques that enabled low-cost production and high wages to workers - - benefits for all American industry, labor, and consumers. At one time, first in size in the auto industry, it is now second to General Motors, a combination of many of his early competitors. His grandson and namesake now heads the business.

Walter P. Chrysler, descendant of an early New York Palatine (named Kreussler), started as a machinist, entered the employ of Buick and became a top production executive. He founded Chrysler Motors, now third in size in the auto industry. He radically influenced auto design and engineering in his time.

Harvey S. Firestone, of Pennsylvania Dutch descent (Feuerstein), developed the great rubber and tire business that bears his name, starting with a very small tire business in Akron, Ohio, and growing with the automobile business. The company has been the leader in its field in product development and quality, and is now second in size only to Goodyear.

Henry C. Fricke, of Pennsylvania Dutch descent, developed a large coke-production business which served the young steel industry in the Pittsburgh area. He sold it to Carnegie Steel Company and became Andrew Carnegie's chief operating executive. He left a large fortune.

Charles M. Schwab, of Pennsylvania Dutch descent, starting as a laborer in a Carnegie Steel mill, advanced to mill superintendent and eventually to company President. He became the first President of the successor U. S. Steel Corporation in 1901, but soon left to become President of Bethlehem Steel, of which he acquired the controlling interest. He built up Bethlehem to be chief competitor of U. S. Steel.

John Wanamaker, of Pennsylvania Dutch descent, starting with a small clothing store, established in Philadelphia one of the first department stores. He was a pioneer in developing new merchandising methods.

Frank M. Woolworth, of pioneer New York German stock, while a young store clerk, conceived the five-and-ten-cent store. He opened his first successful store in Lancaster, Pa., the beginning of a chain of more than 1,000 stores in the United States and Canada. He and several of his partners each acquired a fortune.

Henry J. Kaiser, of New York German descent, entered the sand-and-gravel business in Spokane, Washington, from which he spread progressively into road contracting, construction of dams and industrial plants, and shipbuilding during World War II, in all of which he and his sons and other associates developed new methods and achieved fabulous production goals. The great business that he founded was extended into the manufacture of portland cement, steel, aluminum, and automobiles.

Milton S. Hershey, of Pennsylvania Dutch descent, founded and developed the leading chocolate company in the United States in a city which he founded (Hershey) in the heart of the Pennsylvania Dutch country.

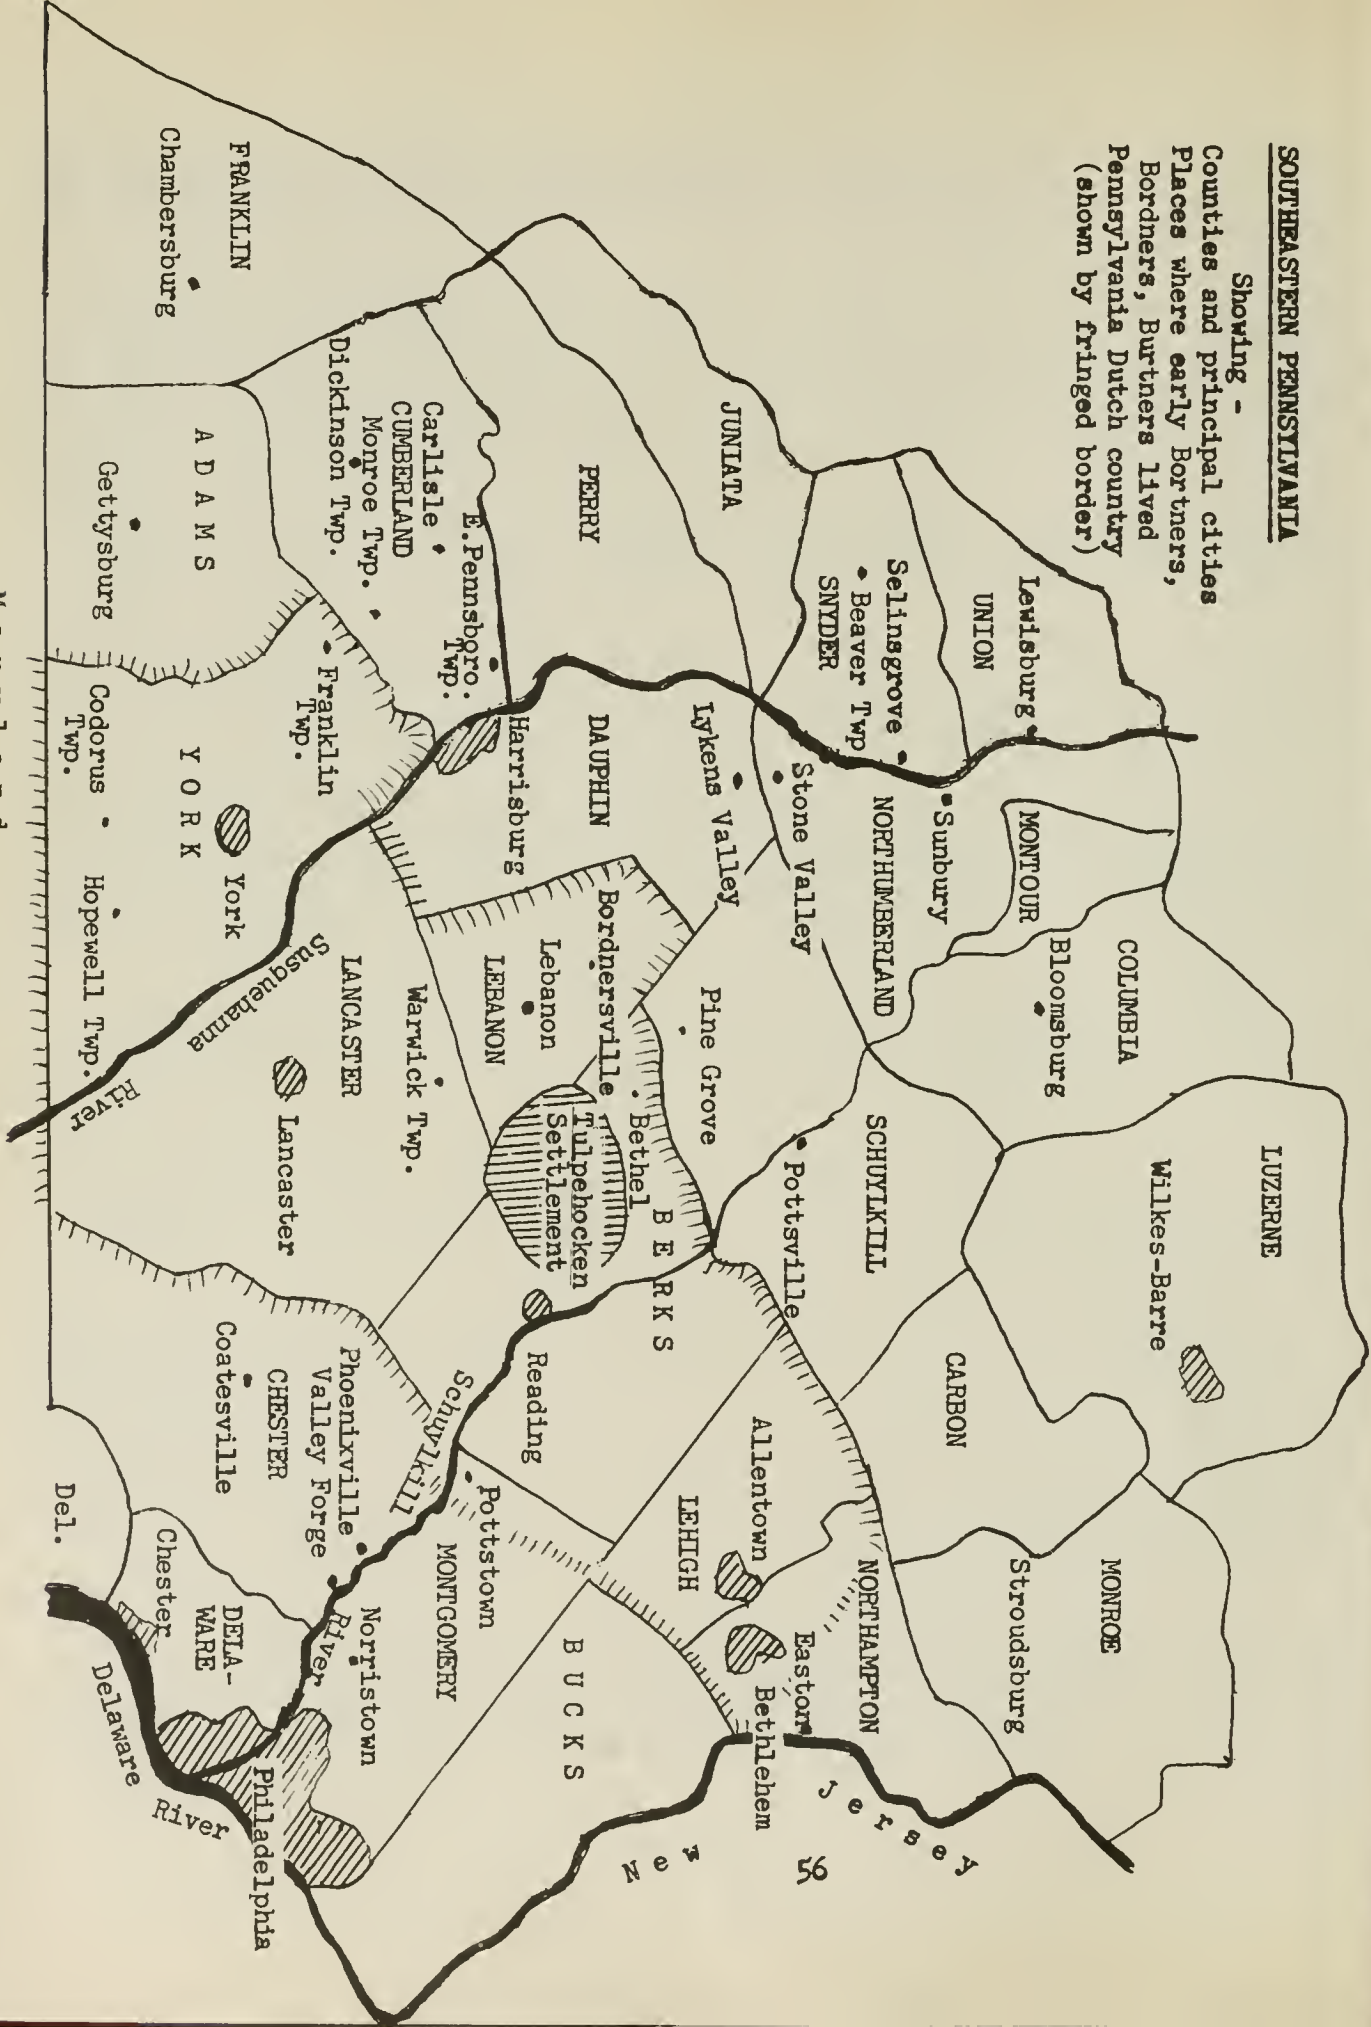

Jumping to the present day, among the leaders of American industry we find the following who are of German-American descent: Frederick G. Donner, Chairman of General Motors (New York German); Roger M. Blough, Chairman of U. S. Steel (Pennsylvania Dutch); and Frederick R. Kappel, Chairman of American Telephone and Telegraph (Minnesota German - - ancestry probably 19th century).

In addition to those Americans of German descent who reached the top in American business, notice should be given to the host of others who have achieved lesser success. From observation in Pennsylvania and Ohio, it is believed that they have had more than a proportionate share of success in smaller business enterprises. They have also entered the professions in strength, including the ministry, but excluding law, for which they seem to have had an aversion. Nevertheless there have been many who have become eminent in government, including the Congress of the United States.

BRIEF BACKGROUND OF GERMAN HISTORY

The German people first appear in recorded history when they repulsed Julius Caesar and his invading Roman legions, not long before the time of Christ. At that time they were half-civilized barbarians who lived in northern Europe along the Rhine River and to the east of the Rhine as far north as the shores of the Baltic Sea. They had many of the culture-characteristics of American Indians. They never called themselves Germans; that name was first used by the Romans.

The Germans have been classified as belonging to the Indo-European family of people which inhabited most of Europe, and even India and Persia. It is believed that they came originally from far-eastern Europe, but nobody knows. This classification of people is based simply upon likenesses in spoken language; it is not a racial classification. However, people who spoke a similar language usually had a similar culture. In these ways, the Scandinavians and Celts were closely related to the Germans. Racially, the Germans have been classified as belonging to the Nordic race of Caucasians (white people), based upon observed physical characteristics, as well as because of the area in which they lived. The other principal category of European Caucasians was the Mediterranean race. However, today's anthropologists question the meaningfulness of this racial classification of Caucasians.

At the time of Julius Caesar, the Germans lived in families in tribal groups, in areas where the soil was fertile, especially in river valleys. Great forests were all around them. They were semi-nomads. Nevertheless, they lived in rude log cabins in small villages, and they tilled the soil nearby and kept livestock for slaughter for their living. They enjoyed warfare. They had rude cloth and fur garments, and primitive iron implements and weapons, but they also used bows and arrows and slingshots. They were monogamous and had a fairly high moral code. Honor meant a great deal to them, but they confused pride with honor; in particular, bravery in battle was essential from the standpoint of honor. Loyalty to one's family and tribe was also important; this meant obtaining vengeance for offenses. Hence, family and tribal feuds were common. They believed in a whole family of Gods, and they had a mythology about them much like the Greeks and Romans. Their myths are available in English under the subject of Norse mythology, in which the names of the Gods are slightly different. Their Gods were both revered and feared. Everybody considered that he had one special God to whom he could look for aid; but some other God might be antagonistic. Their Gods were not perfect; they had all of the weaknesses and strengths of human beings. They fought among themselves; eventually it was expected that they would engage in a final struggle (twilight of the Gods). Among men, proven heroes in battle, they thought, would go to a warriors' heaven (Valhalla), there to be held for participation in the final struggle among the Gods. Otherwise, they thought that spirits of the dead lingered only briefly near the scenes of their former lives. They believed also in sorcerers, witches, evil spirits, goblins, etc.

Before the time of Caesar, the German tribes had driven the Celts from the area, and the Celts, in turn, had occupied the area of present-day Switzerland and had invaded the areas of present-day France, Spain, England, Scotland, and Ireland, where they merged with the previous inhabitants and influenced their physical and cultural heritage. Not much is known about migrations which occurred previously, but we can be sure that there is no such thing as racial purity for any European people.

The Romans undertook to defend the relatively docile Gauls, whom they had conquered (in the territory of modern France), from the menacing Germans, whom the Gauls greatly feared, by occupying all of the territory west of the Rhine and by building a line of fortifications just east of it. They also occupied all of the territory south of the Danube River and east of the Rhine. This meant that they had to conquer the German tribes along the Rhine, principally the Franks and the Alemans, who were ferocious fighters. They also had to cope with occasional subsequent attacks by the Germans, including the tribes that lived farther east.

During the period that the Romans occupied the Rhineland, they established a number of important towns and brought a higher civilization to the German people who lived there. The Romans applied their normal methods of colonial control, with participation by the inhabitants in their own government, and with recruiting among the people for the Roman army. Thus they secured the loyalty of those they would otherwise have had to fight, as well as made colonial administration manageable. In the process, they taught civil and military organization and administration; they introduced their own advanced system of law and justice; and they introduced improved military tactics and weaponry. They also introduced improved architecture and civil engineering, including masonry construction, and other useful arts and sciences, not the least of which was the Latin alphabet, which was used as a basis for a written German language. And in the fourth century, having become Christianized themselves, they began to introduce Christianity among the frontier Germans; this process took a long time (it was not completed by the Romans during the period of occupation). Those Germans who were Roman subjects, greatly admired and respected the arts of their conquerors, and their leaders were grateful for the civil and military honors and privileges that had been given to them. This attitude of respect and admirations for the Romans passed on to the more remote German tribes in the hinterland, as they learned about the higher civilization.

About the year 330 A.D., the Roman Emperor, Constantine I, moved the capital of the Roman Empire from the city of Rome to the city later called Constantinople (now Istanbul, in Turkey) at a strategic cross-roads between East and West. He was the first Christian Emperor, and he decreed recognition of the Christian Church in the Empire, after many years of Roman persecution of Christians. After that time there was a clear separation of the Empire in two parts, East and West. Gaul, of course, was in the western part of the Empire. However, the Emperor in Constantinople continued to be recognized as Emperor of the whole until the year 800. Most of the Emperors after the time of Christ were despots.

The Roman Empire had begun to decay even before the year 330, from internal weaknesses, including corruption, venality, and general immorality, but the process of decay and disintegration took a long time. During that time the German tribes were restless, and several made extraordinary migrations within the Empire that not only hastened its complete downfall and made it more agonizing, but also significantly affected the future nations of Europe and their people. These migrations occurred because of the natural vigor and adventuresomeness of the Germans, but also probably because of the pressure of increasing population and lack of food resources, due to limitations of ancient agricultural methods and failure to use effectively all of the arable land available in the areas where they then lived. Some of the migrations may have followed inter-tribal fighting for the possession of most desirable territory, the weaker people being forced to migrate. These migrations sometimes involved conquest, with cruel, vicious warfare. During this period, Rome was sacked more than once by barbaric German armies.

More important migrations of German tribes included the following:

Many of the Goths settled ultimately in Italy and in southern Gaul and Spain, after having first migrated to the lower Danube River valley.

The Lombards settled in northern Italy.

The Burgundians settled in southeastern Gaul and what is now western Switzerland.

The Vandals settled ultimately on the north African coast, after having wandered destructively through Gaul and Spain. Later they ravaged Italy for fun.

The Franks later conquered all of Gaul, including the Goths and Burgundians, and many settled there. France was subsequently named for them.

Many of the Alemans settled in what is now Switzerland, after the Franks conquered their tribe and occupied some of their land in the middle Rhine Valley.

Angles, Jutes, and Saxons settled in England (named for the Angles) and drove the previous inhabitants into the area now known as Wales.

Some of the sea-roving, piratical Scandinavian Vikings (Norseman or Normans) settled in northern Gaul, especially in Normandy (which took its name from them). Some of their Norman-French grandchildren later conquered England and became its rulers.

Thus the English people (Anglo-Saxons) and a large part of the Swiss people are primarily German; the northern Italians have a large infusion of German blood; and the people in some parts of France, Spain, and North Africa have some German blood. The English language is a Germanic language, but the French, Italian, and Spanish languages are Romanic (Latin). Most of the Swiss speak German and have the German culture, but some are French and Italian; they have not mixed very much, since they have remained separated in different areas in the main.

The Franks, who lived originally in the northern Rhine valley, became the most powerful and greatest of the German tribes. They established the Frankish Kingdom about the year 500 A.D., and extended it by continuous conquests until ultimately, under Charles the Great (Charlemagne), it became an empire which superseded the Roman Empire in the West. His empire included all of what is now France, Germany, Switzerland, the Netherlands, Belgium, and parts of Spain, Italy (northern part, including Rome), Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia.

In Rome, after the departure of the Emperor, the Bishop of the Christian Church became the dominant political force, as well as the spiritual head of the Church. He claimed to inherit his position from St. Peter, who was alleged to have been in Rome when he died. St. Peter was the disciple who Christ directed to establish the church and allegedly gave the authority to promise eternal life for the faithful. As St. Peter's successors, the Bishops of Rome claimed to inherit his power to grant eternal life; that is, to possess the keys to heaven. With this assertion of supreme spiritual authority, the Bishops of Rome came to adopt the title "Pope" to signify superiority over all other Bishops. While the Pope's position insured that he would have ample wealth and income, he had no military force for protection; moreover, if he had such a force, leadership of it would be incompatible with his spiritual position.

The Kings of the Lombards, the Roman Senate, and other authorities in Italy often quarreled with the Popes' asserted authority. More than once, the Popes requested and obtained military assistance in such quarrels from the Kings of the Franks, all of whom were devout Christians. After one of those occasions, in the year 800 A.D., the Pope offered to crown Charlemagne as Emperor of a Holy Roman Empire of the West. Such a position would require that he undertake to protect the Christian faith, including the Pope. Charlemagne accepted and was crowned by the Pope in Rome on Christmas day, with the enthusiastic approval of the people in the city of Rome. This amounted to a declaration of independence from the old empire, which still existed in the East, with its capital in Constantinople. This act, however, did not add one bit to the area that Charlemagne had previously conquered.

The Emperors of the Eastern Empire never recognized the validity of the separation of the Western Empire, but they could do nothing about it. The Eastern Empire, sometimes called the Byzantine Empire, lived for several centuries, although it was continuously eroded by conquests from without - - in particular, by the Arabs, Turks, and Bulgars (a northern slavic tribe). Its brave fights against the Moslems protected Western Europe. The Eastern Empire finally expired in 1453, when the Turks captured Constantinople. In the meantime, they had established a separate division of the Christian Church, independent of the Pope in Rome; this division, called The Eastern Orthodox Church, continued to live after the Eastern Empire expired. The western division of the Christian Church, under the Popes, became known as The (Roman) Catholic Church.

The creation of The Holy Roman Empire of the West appealed greatly to most of the people within its boundaries, especially to the Germans. They were used to one super-nation and greatly yearned for the protection that they thought it would provide in that violent age - - peace, freedom from continual warfare and feuds, freedom from brigands and marauders, orderly administration of justice, and maintenance of a healthy climate for growth of the Christian church, with the practice of universal brotherhood of men. They considered that the Pope was God's sole representative on earth for the protection of their salvation in heaven; as a parallel concept, they thought that God should have one representative on earth to govern temporal affairs and keep order. They did not worry about the dangers of tyranny from rule by one man; they were used to despotism, and did not know what else could be expected. Moreover, they did not expect a need for a government indefinitely; at that time, Christians expected that the end of the world would not be long in coming. In the meantime, they would like to have a partnership between their spiritual and temporal leaders; they wanted all-embracing unity in all things. It would be centuries before these simple idealistic concepts would be recognized as unrealistic, based upon experience.

Charlemagne was one of the world's all-time, all-around great geniuses, and an authentic hero, idealistic and devoted to duty, although he enjoyed power and position, as all such men do. He was a good administrator and made use of talents of native leaders in ruling the different states in his empire. He found time to oversee administration of public affairs, including justice, although he was often with his army in warfare to extend the empire and to put down rebellions of his obstreperous, semi-wild chieftans. In particular, he had difficulty in forcing the Saxons to accept Christianity, but this he did after long brutal persecution. He also found time to encourage learning and the arts. Despite his barbaric methods, he was a great man for his time, and as might be expected, he would not be followed by others equally competent.

Charlemagne acted not only as ruler of the Empire, but also as ruler of the Church in the Empire in temporal matters. For example, he appointed bishops and removed them for malfeasance, convened Church councils, and through the state controlled all church property, just as he controlled the titles and property of the nobles of the realm. Ultimately the Popes would challenge exercise of such power by his successors.

Charlemagne expected that succession to the crown of Emperor of The Holy Roman Empire, as well as King of the Franks, would be hereditary, but there was no legal basis for such succession (nor for any other, for that matter). Eventually this also became a subject of contention between the Popes and the Emperors, and even between them and the people they ruled.

After Charlemagne died, his weaker descendants were unable to hold the Empire together. The Pope and the Italian authorities did not even accept his grandson as Emperor. In fact, his three grandsons, after fighting each other, divided the Empire into an Eastern Frankish Kingdom (German), a Western Frankish Kingdom (French), and a smaller middle kingdom between them ruled by the one they finally acknowledged to be Emperor of the whole. Charlemagne's male line died out with a great grandson, and his claim to be Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire passed to a Saxon descendant, Henry (the Fowler). He united the three parts of the empire in theory, and brought renewed life to it. His son, Otto the Great, succeeded in completing the establishment of real authority over the entire original empire of Charlemagne, except for a northern part of what is now France, including Paris. (In fact, no succeeding Emperor ever succeeded in reestablishing his authority there, and this is generally considered to have marked the beginning of France as a nation.)

Early in his reign, Otto the Great led an army that met and overwhelmed a powerful invading Hungarian army; that battle won undisputed possession of the land that later became the German state of Austria. In the year 962, Otto crossed the Alps with a powerful army to help the Pope, at his request, in another of his perennial fights with the Lombards and the city of Rome. The Italians were cowed into submission, and the Pope rewarded Otto by crowning him Emperor in Rome, thus recognizing a revived Empire. Again this did not add one bit to the territory under German control, but it made it easier for Otto to exercise control. Otto then forced the Pope to acknowledge that he was only one of the Emperor's subjects and that, henceforth, the election of each successive Pope would require the Emperor's approval. Not long afterwards, the Pope went to France to reside. Otto then convoked a synod of the clergy in Rome, tried the Pope on charges brought by the clergy, found him both immoral and incompetent, and named a successor. Then Otto returned to his principal capital, Aachen, in the Frankish Kingdom. These actions marked a high point in exercise of power by the Emperors in a long and bitter struggle with the Popes; only once more would an Emperor discharge and replace a Pope. Later a stronger Pope would temporarily excommunicate an Emperor and bring him to his knees, because excommunication hurt his standing with the people. But it was Otto's insistence on morality and competence of the Popes that strengthened the character of the future Popes.

After Otto, the Holy Roman Empire of the West continued to exist until Napoleon dissolved it by decree in the year 1804, after conquering all of its ancient territory - - a period of more than a thousand years from the coronation of Charlemagne. However, for the last half of its existence, it was only a shell. It became German, rather than Roman (or European); it became the loosest kind of confederation of German states, rather than an empire; and it was no longer Holy, in the sense of being a partner of the Roman Catholic Church. Yet the German people long continued to dream of the high hopes they had when it was created, and of the days of glory of the empire (including the original Roman Empire), while their national strength became helpless and France became powerful and trod all over them, shearing off piece-meal much German territory west of the Rhine.

It would be both boring and confusing to go into the ebbs and flows of the fortunes of the Empire over the centuries, and the names of the many emperors, although some of them were both good and able. They averaged much better than the Kings of France and England. Only the highlights of the Empire's history will be outlined.

First, it would be desirable to describe the political, economic, and social system that was established in the German states during the middle ages, known as feudalism. Under that system, there was a pyramidal hierarchy of nobles, with the Emperor at the top. The top ranks of nobility were given originally to the successors of the great German tribal chiefs (in Franconia, Saxony, Swabia, Bavaria, Lorraine, Burgundy, and Lombardy) and to rulers of similar major territories. In most instances the head of one of these states was called "Duke", and the state was called a "Duchy". In very few instances was it necessary to call the head of the state "King", and his state a "Kingdom", thus undesirably recognizing him to be on a level with the King of the Franks. Such exceptions were Bohemia, Burgundy, and Lombardy, yet in the case of Lombardy, the King of the Franks himself assumed the title of King. Each King and Duke swore loyalty to the Emperor and to serve him faithfully when required, including provision of soldiers; they were called "vassals" of the Emperor. Similarly each King or Duke possessed the loyalty and right to services of lesser nobles, such as Counts (who ruled "Counties") - - their vassals. In turn each such noble created lesser nobles (such as Barons), who were his vassals. Each noble was given ownership of specific land from the King or noble above him (called a "fief"). In case of infidelity or failure to meet his obligations to render service, his fief could be declared forfeited by his superior and repossessed. The title of each noble, as well as his fief, was hereditary, and could not be transferred except by forfeiture, or by reversion to the overlord, if the male line died out.

Most nobles had strategically-placed castles that served as forts, as well as residences. Ultimately there were about 10,000 castles in the German states. The ruins of many still exist; a few are still used. Each castle had its own chapel, its service facilities, and its nearby supporting farmlands, pastures, and woodlands. Each castle unit was self-sufficient economically, politically, and socially for many years. The higher nobles were served by officials and a small standing military force, each of noble rank. All of the nobles in each castle were served by peasants - - in the castle, in their service facilities (such as the mill and blacksmith shop), and on their farms, in the production of food, materials for clothing, etc. They were served by members of the clergy in the education of their children, as well as in religious matters.

Most of the peasants were farmers; as a general rule, they lived in a village near the castle. They were like tenant-farmers. Each had a strip of land allotted to him for growing his own crops, and he had rights to use the lord's woodland to gather wood, and to use the common pasturelands for grazing his cattle and maintaining his hogs. In return, he had to give part of his time to work on that part of the lord's farmlands that he held to supply his own needs, and to labor on other projects of the lord. He also had to pay fees for the use of pasture and woodland and to hunt in the forest. He was required to use the lord's mill, blacksmith shop, etc., and if he desired to sell any of his products, he first had to offer them for sale to the lord. There were other assessments against the peasants, including tithes to support the church maintained for them, contributions for the marriage dowries of the lord's daughters and for the ceremonies involved in bestowing knighthood on the lord's sons, death taxes, etc. Peasants also would be subject to fines if found guilty of misdemeanors in the lord's court. During the early middle ages, rents, fees, etc. were payable principally in goods and services; later there were some payments in money.

Most of the peasants were bound to serve their lord and could not choose to serve another. The lord might sell them to others, if he chose. They were true serfs. However, some peasants were free men. The major difference between the free and unfree was that a free peasant could leave, if he chose, to become a tenant for some other lord, or to go to a city to live. Unfree peasants might obtain temporary freedom by paying a tax proportionate to the period of freedom. They might obtain permanent freedom by voluntary action of the lord, or by purchasing it (if they could obtain the money), or they might escape and go to a city, in which residence for a year would allow them freedom, provided they were not caught and returned to their lord in the meantime. A peasant's sons inherited his class status, free or unfree.

Peasants, however, did have certain rights and benefits, in addition to the goods they could produce for themselves on the lord's land. They were entitled to ownership of personal property, to housing for their families and their animals, to protection from marauders, to justice in the lord's court in case of offenses by others, and to maintenance of simple human dignity. They were also exempt from military service, at least until later years. A peasant's personal property was subject to inheritance by his survivors (subject to the death tax) and the oldest son inherited the right to take over his father's strip of farmland (but not if his father was a free man).

Under this system, peasants were forced to work from dawn to dusk, six days a week, in order to make a living. And the women had to work in the fields, as well as the men. It was this life that made them strong, industrious, and frugal.

Peasants were permitted to have only a limited education, and they were told not to be concerned with political and economic matters - - that they were not wise enough for that; that they should trust their lord to do what is best. The clergy supported that view and told the peasants that servitude was a natural thing for the masses; that it was God's will. They tried to keep the peasants' minds on the hereafter, as an escape from life. The peasants accepted this condition for generations, but in time, they became more and more dissatisfied and also resentful of the clergy as well as the nobles. When they rebelled, they achieved nothing.

While the foregoing description of peasant life was generally applicable, there were exceptions. For example, in the Alpine valleys in the south, agricultural peasants did not live in villages; they lived on individual farms. It is also understood that there were more free men among the peasants in the eastern-border districts and in Saxony. To induce emigrants to settle in the eastern-border districts, peasants in other areas were offered their freedom from bondage.

The church had a similar system of nobles, consisting of Archbishops, Bishops, and Abbots (heads of monasteries), except that those positions were not hereditary.

They also had landed estates (fiefs) to support their establishments. Originally the Emperor appointed them, as well as other nobles, but the Pope later forced recognition of his authority to make these appointments. However, the Emperor, and later, the heads of the individual states, retained the function of controlling their fiefs, in about the same manner as for other nobles. The church nobles had their own peasants to serve them, provide their livelihood, and free them to spend full time on their church functions, just as the peasants provided the livelihood of the lay nobles for public administration, warfare, sport, and leisure.

In time, as cities grew up with the development of trade, industry, and banking, another class of citizens was established for their residents, called "burghers". They were a step above peasants and a step below the church nobles. Their ownership of land was generally less important than the exercise of skill as a craftsman, a merchant, etc. While at first the right to the exercise of such skills was under the control of the lord who controlled the city, eventually each craft formed a union called a "guild" which exercised control of its own members. The guild established regulations governing quality of the members' products, qualifications of a master craftsman and the lesser journeyman, rules of apprenticeship, etc. In this way, the quality of German products became outstanding internationally, and the capitalistic system of business enterprise came into being in Germany. An extensive system of trading and banking also developed, both locally and internationally. Many of the larger cities became like independent states; they were called "free cities". Eventually the guilds and the other burghers became represented in city government through membership in city councils, thus establishing the beginning of democracy. Education, science, and the arts thrived also in these cities. Yet it was seldom that a burgher could become a noble, and for years no noble could become a burgher. Strangely, feudalism in the rural areas existed for many years alongside the completely different capitalistic, democratic system in the cities.

Each state and free city had its own system of public administration and dispensing justice, under its own laws. The laws established by the Emperor were few. The Empire had a Council called the "Diet", composed of the principal nobles, but it had no real power.

Knighthood came into existence beginning shortly after the time of Charlemagne. Previously the German armies overcame their enemies by weight of numbers of foot-soldiers, distinguished by their individual strength and ferocity. About the 10th century smaller armies consisting of knights mounted on horses, became more effective. Gradually both knights and horses became more heavily armored. Individual knights required servants (squires and pages) to assist them - - to care for their horses, weapons, and armor, as well as to supply their personal needs. The expenses of maintaining knights placed a natural limitation on the number that could be supported by the nobles, and hence on the number that could be mobilized by the Emperor. Under these conditions, only nobles could become knights. While many knights had their own fiefs to support them, others did not, and they depended upon support by their liege lords; they were true professional soldiers.

Since knights were covered by armor, they adopted individual insignia and colors for identification, especially in battle, where it was important to distinguish friend from foe. These insignia became the basis for the coats-of-arms which have been prized by some of their descendants.

The Church got into the picture and helped to establish ideals and rules for knighthood, including chivalry towards women, charity and assistance to the poor and weak, observance of certain rules of sportsmanship in fighting, etc. The Crusades were conducted at the request of the Popes by armies of French, English, and German knights to redeem the Holy Land from the infidel Moslems. In the 12th century, a German army, numbering almost 100,000, was led on the Third Crusade by the Emperor Frederick I (Barbarossa - meaning "red beard"). He became a legendary figure, like King Richard I (the lion-hearted) who led an army of English knights on the same crusade. The Crusades had no permanent success. However, they show something of the degree of enthusiasm for Christianity by the European peoples of that time, the greatness of the need for an outlet for the energies of the semi-idle nobles, and their still savage fighting instincts. The history of the Crusades shows that the ideals of knighthood had not been extended to the treatment of defeated infidels and their women and children; barbarism still existed in war.

Eventually, during the 15th century, knighthood became obsolete, as methods of warfare changed with the introduction of gunpowder. By the year 1500, German armies were composed of foot soldiers with muskets and artillery. Many impoverished knights became robbers and highwaymen, rather than take up farming, with its peasant status. Even after knighthood became obsolete, some of the customs of knighthood continued for awhile - - in England right up to the present day.

Several of the early German Emperors after Otto, sought to strengthen their hold on Rome and northern Italy by spending most of their time in Rome, rather than in Aachen, or elsewhere in the German states. They were unpopular with the Italian people, especially when they were living north of the Alps. Whatever the Emperors gained by this, they more than lost through alienation of the German people and the results of machinations of the German nobles in their absence. Anyhow, in time they lost possession of Rome, the free cities of northern Italy (such as Milan), and eventually most of the rest of northern Italy.

The Emperors had found in the beginning that their German princes, who were very headstrong, self-seeking individuals, still half-barbaric, were much impressed by the fact that the Emperor had an empire which covered most of Europe, and that he was the partner of the Pope in a holy enterprise. The ideals of the time have been mentioned. Therefore, the early Emperors obtained a real advantage through The Holy Roman Empire in ruling the German people. Perhaps they could not have had a unified German state very long without the empire and all that it meant. But it eventually ceased to have that usefulness. Moreover, because its existence was maintained after it should have been abandoned, the results were catastrophic.

In the 13th century when the male line of the Emperors of that period died out, the German princes began to elect the Emperors, disregarding the claim of the Pope to have that authority and abolishing the practice of transmission of the crown in an hereditary line. They developed a system of using Electors. There were only seven Electors - - the three princes of the Church (the Archbishops of Mainz, Trier, and Cologne) - - and the heads of the largest states, except Bavaria (the King of Bohemia, the Duke of Saxony, the Count of the Palatinate, and the Margrave of Brandenburg). The Duke of Bavaria was added during the Thirty Years' War in the 17th century. The kingdoms of Lombardy and Burgundy had been broken up and parts had been lost to the empire. And the Duchies of Franconia and Swabia had vanished when their male lines died out; they had been broken up into smaller states by the Emperor, with lesser rank for their heads. The Palatinate and Brandenburg were the largest of the new states. Thus the lesser states and the free cities (which had become increasingly numerous and important) had no voice in the election of the Emperor, but they were given the privilege of making nominations to the Electors. The powerful position of Elector was of such importance as to result in the common use of that title by the seven princes, in preference to their normal noble titles.

The Electors used their power to bargain with the prospective candidates to make them agree in advance to relinquish such of their feudal powers as already had not been extracted from their predecessors, beginning with the period during which the Emperors resided principally in Rome. And many of the Emperors, attempting to secure their succession by their oldest son, would during their reign be subservient to the Electors and bargain away powers. By this means, the Electors eventually obtained absolute power for themselves in their respective states, and also for the heads of other states and free cities (which provided the basis for their continued support of the Electors). Of course, this destroyed all power of the empire.

France and England did not fall into this anarchistic trap, probably because each started from a much smaller beginning and built up gradually. In France, it was the Counts of Paris, the Capet family, who eventually became the Kings of France, by extending their fiefs by marriage, by never dividing their territories between the heirs of a deceased Count, and eventually by war and negotiation. From the beginning they maintained direct relations with subvassals, keeping their direct loyalty without dependence upon intermediate nobles. The intermediate nobles were allowed to function as governors, but appeals to the crown were encouraged against oppressive acts of crown vassals, thus undermining crown vassals' authority. The Counts of Paris also exploited their rights to property confiscation, reversion, and redistribution. In England, the Kings also took similar steps; in particular, they made all subvassals, as well as vassals, do homage to the King, and they outlawed all wars between vassals, so that no vassal could increase his fiefs and individual power by means of force.

In practice, the Electors always selected one of the Hapsburg family to be Emperor, although theoretically any Christian of noble birth was eligible, whether or not he was a German. In fact, one of the French kings and one of the English kings were nominated and considered as candidates at different times.

The Hapsburg Emperors accepted the situation, and they did little for the Empire. The position became significant only as an honor, because it was a symbol of one-time glory and ideals. Each Emperor derived his financial support largely from his own feudal estate, and he gave his attention principally to advancing his own wealth and position and that of other members of the Hapsburg family. Many were the head of the newer southeastern German state of Austria (Osterreich - - meaning, "eastern country"). Austria eventually became a separate empire and great power in Europe. Although Austria was the basic seat of power of the Hapsburgs, they spread into positions of power in other states in Europe, including France and Spain, by means of marriages.

One of the Hapsburgs, the Emperor Frederick III (1415 - 1493), will be mentioned here, because he was the one who authorized the knightly coat-of-arms for Hans Bortner and his sons, Hans and Paul, in the year 1454. Originally he was Duke of Styria and Carinthia (later part of Austria). He was made Emperor by the Electors in 1440, but was not crowned by the Pope in Rome until 1452. To obtain the Pope's coronation, he first had to pledge obedience of the German people to the Pope. The Electors were unhappy with him, because of that pledge to the Pope, his failure to attend meetings of the Diet of the German princes, and his weakness in handling rebellious subjects in Austria and Switzerland. They considered replacing him, but could not agree on a successor. Eventually he succeeded in gaining control in Austria (but not in Switzerland), and in laying something of a foundation for a better reign by his more able son, Emperor Maximilian I (called the last of the great knights).

Following Maximilian I came the Hapsburg Emperor, Charles V (1519 - 1556), who also became King of Spain, because he married a daughter of King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella of Spain (famous in the story of Columbus). He had to cope with the Protestant Reformation in the Empire, as will be related.

The German lay-nobility and peasants had long been unhappy with the increasing power of the Roman Catholic Church and its extensive acquisition of land to support an ever-increasing horde of monks and nuns, as well as the clergy. The lay-nobles also resented the Pope's interference in political matters. There was also dissatisfaction among the peasants, stemming from their oppression, with indirect resentment of the Church, because it supported the feudal system as being in the natural order of things, and because it benefitted therefrom. Hence, when a German Augustinian monk, named Martin Luther, challenged the sacred doctrines of the Church, he had many followers, including the heads of some of the German states and free cities. The principles involved, the struggles that followed, and the results, are fascinating history, which can only be briefly outlined here.

Luther's main contention was that the church was basically in error in its whole system of confessions to priests and penances required by sinners. He held that, according to the Bible, man can obtain salvation (eternal life in heaven) by faith alone, based upon God's grace and the sacrifices of Jesus Christ for mankind. In particular, he criticized penances by good works, and specifically the obtaining of money thereby for the Catholic Church ("sales of indulgences", he called them). This struck at the foundation of authority that the Church had established and used for centuries; hence, the Pope accused Luther of heresy. After a trial, Luther was found guilty and was excommunicated. He narrowly escaped execution by fleeing to another German state and hiding in the castle of a friendly noble for a year, while he gathered such powerful support as would insure his safety.

Luther was not the first nor the only Christian reformer of that period. For example, almost a century before, John Huss, a Czech-nationalist professor in the University of Prague, in the Kingdom of Bohemia, had advocated certain religious reforms in Bohemia, had been tried for heresy, found guilty, and burned at the stake, with the approval of the German Emperor. But that did not stamp out his ideas among the people. The Moravians, some of whom came to Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, many years later, were among the descendants of the Hussites.

In the middle ages, a heretic was considered to be a traitor to the Church, because he had violated his vows to accept the Church's creed that he had taken voluntarily when he became a member. The general view at that time was that excommunication by the Church was not enough for a traitor; he should be punished as a traitor to the state also - - the degree of punishment being proportioned to the crime. Torture of heretics was common; death, especially by burning, was not infrequent. The same contrary ideas in a non-Christian was not heresy, and was not so punishable.

Luther's most powerful supporters, the heads of some of the independent states and free cities, formed a league to support him. They were soon required to battle the army of the Emperor, Charles V, who was determined to eradicate the church-reform movement, not only because he was sworn to defend the faith, but because he was a devout Catholic by training and more Spanish than German in his nature. The Emperor brought a Spanish army to Germany for this purpose, and he was assisted by forces from those states whose princes were loyal to the Catholic cause, including especially the Dukes of Bavaria and Austria. The forces of the Protestant league were defeated about one year after Luther's death. However, the Protestant princes soon regrouped and obtained assistance from King Henry II of France, who was willing to fight the Emperor and weaken the Empire, regardless of the cause (which, in this case, was contrary to his own beliefs). This time the Emperor's forces were defeated, and the Emperor, himself, narrowly escaped capture.

There followed a general convention, the Diet of Augsburg, in which the Emperor sought to conciliate the Lutheran Protestants. A peace agreement was concluded in the year 1555, that provided: (1) the ruler of each German state and free city could choose between the Roman Catholic and Lutheran creeds and impose the chosen creed on all of his subjects; (2) those subjects who chose a religion different from their ruler would be permitted to move to some other territory; and (3) any noble of the Catholic Church who might choose to turn Lutheran would be required to surrender his land, which would then continue to be held by the Catholic Church (although any Lutherans living on such lands might practice that religion). One important reason for this compromise was the desire of the Emperor and the Duke of Austria for military assistance by the Lutheran princes in repelling one of the frequent Turkish invasions of Austria from the east at that particular time.

Charles V was very unhappy with the Peace of Augsburg. He had had a long difficult reign. During the earlier years he had warred successfully with the French King and with Italian princes over certain disputed territories claimed by Hapsburg princes, and in the middle of his reign his armies had fought and repelled an attack by the Turks which threatened to overrun Austria. And throughout his reign, he had striven desperately against the rising tide of the Reformation. In the process, he had used Spanish troops against his German subjects, and thus incensed even some of his loyal Catholic subjects. He felt defeated and resigned; he retired to a Catholic monastery in Spain. His oldest and ablest son became King Philip II of Spain, but he was unacceptable to the German Electors; they chose another son, Ferdinand I, to be Emperor. Henceforth, while the German Emperors continued to be Catholic, they no longer had an empire with a single religion, the Roman Catholic faith - - and this violated a basic concept of the original Holy Roman Empire. It was symbolic of the change that no Emperor after Charles V was crowned by a Pope; henceforth, in fact, they were to be Emperors of a German empire.

To return to the reforms of Luther that were adopted in the church whose creed bears his name: The elimination of the confessional and penances was accompanied by reduction in the authoritative character of the clergy. They were no longer to intercede to Christ, through the Virgin Mary or the Saints, in behalf of sinners. They were no longer to enter the private lives of the church members, unless invited. Every member was brought closer to God; he was encouraged to read the Bible and judge the word of God for himself (although listening to expert interpretation by his pastor), rather than to blindly take for granted the statements of his priest. Luther, himself, translated the Bible into German; not the first German translation, but one that had superior literary merit and basically influenced the German language. The invention of the process of printing in Mainz a century before by John Gutenberg, enabled universal dissemination of the Bible. The reduction in the authoritative character of the clergy was accompanied by the elimination of an absolute monarchy in the church; the Lutheran Church had no Pope. However doctrinal authoritarianism was continued, with punishment of heretics - - including physical punishment by the state for many years. Lutheran reforms also included simplification of church organization, elimination of monastic orders, reduction of the sacraments of marriage and the funeral to mere religious rites (leaving only baptism and communion as sacraments), reduction in the use of religious images and symbols, elimination of veneration of religious souvenirs (such as bones of the Saints), and freedom of the clergy to marry.

The Lutheran Church adopted Luther's doctrine that man does not have a free will to choose the course of his life; that his acts are determined by God's Will; and that, in fact, the events of his life are predetermined by God from his birth. The Roman Catholic Church held that man had a free will to choose within limits. In modern times, the Catholic view has become generally accepted by all Protestants, rather than Luther's view. Indeed, the basis of development and progress in the United States has been application of the most liberal conception regarding the applicability of free will. Perhaps Luther felt impelled to deny the existence of free will, because of the political and social conditions of his time, in order to explain the naturalness of injustice and oppression of man (that is, man was affected by so many unavoidable evil forces, human as well as natural). But even then, it would seem reasonable to have acknowledged that man did at least have the power to choose between good and evil, recognizing that sometimes, if he chose good, he would have to suffer for it.

Luther's stand against religious authoritarianism actually constituted encouragement of revolt against extreme political authoritarianism (tyranny), although he never foresaw it. However, it was so interpreted by the German peasants during his lifetime. They felt encouraged to band together to demand and fight for increased freedom. The great Peasants' War of 1524/5 in southern and central Germany (not the first) followed the peasants making demands for abolition of serfdom, the tithe, and the death tax; free use of pastures, woods, and water; free choice of their own pastors. During this war, the peasants destroyed much property and killed many people, but they were subdued by superior force and subjected to terrible vengeance. Many thousands of peasants were slain, and many thousands were tortured and crippled for life. Luther, himself, opposed the revolution and angrily called for its suppression in blood, although he acknowledged there were good reasons for complaints. The peasants were shocked by Luther's attitude, and they said that he advocated a religion only for the nobles, not for the common man.

Lutheranism spread rapidly throughout Germany, excluding Austria, Bavaria, a few of the small states and the cities which were under political control of Catholic Archbishops and Bishops. It also spread quickly to the Scandinavian countries.

A second Protestant Reformation, generally known later as Calvinism, occurred in Switzerland at the same time as the Lutheran Reformation.

The Swiss Confederation began as a league of three small German Alpine cantons, solely for defense against their tyrannical local overlord, who was one of the Hapsburg family. In the year 1315, they were forced to defend themselves against the Hapsburg Knights; they won the battle with a peasant army. The Confederation soon admitted several cities, including Zurich, Bern, and Luzern. Since certain of these cities were in Austrian territory, Austria sent a force to break up the Confederation; again the Swiss forces won. Over a period of years, other cantons and cities were admitted to the Confederation, including some of French and Italian character in the west and south; and other wars followed with Austria and the Duchy of Burgundy, in all of which the Swiss were victorious. Eventually Swiss independence was recognized by a peace treaty with Austria in 1499, but the Confederation remained part of the Empire for another century and a half.

The Swiss reformation began in the great cathedral in Zurich, where the Roman Catholic priest, Ulrich Zwingli, not only preached a reformed creed, but changed the methods of worship, after first selling his views to the city council. His ideas were much like Luther's. In fact, when Luther and Zwingli were brought together in the year 1529 by a German prince, in an attempt to have them harmonize their differences and perhaps work together, they agreed on almost everything except the character of Communion. Luther accepted the ancient Catholic myth that the bread and wine were actually Christ's body and blood, while Zwingli adopted a rational concept that the bread and wine were only symbolic, and that Christ was present only in spirit. Despite Zwingli's greater rationalism generally, he agreed completely with Luther on the subject of the non-free will and predestination. But it was for such differences that Protestants split into a number of different churches. Not all of the early Protestants accepted the need for differences in creeds that arose. We can sympathize with the opinion of many of our early Pennsylvania Dutch ancestors, who were reported to have said that they saw no more difference between the Reformed and Lutheran Churches than between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee.

Aside from their formal religious creeds, there is one other belief of the subsequent followers of both Luther and Zwingli that deserves mention. In later years it became known as the Protestant Ethic. This is the conviction that it is God's Will and pleasure that mankind should be industrious, thrifty, and frugal.

Zwingli served as Chaplain of the Swiss army in one of the wars with the Austrians, and died on the field of battle. Peculiarly, the Austrians were joined in that battle by peasants from some of the Swiss rural cantons which were still devoutly Catholic, in order that they might help stamp out the Zurich heresy (which of course was not done).

Zwingli's teachings spread rapidly throughout the Swiss Confederation. And in Geneva, a French refugee, named Jean Calvin, led the movement with great vigor, and a Scotchman, named John Knox, became his disciple and carried the movement back to Scotland. It is Calvin's name, rather than Zwingli's, that was given thereafter to this second major division of the Protestant Reformation; possibly because his name is simpler. However, the name Calvin does not appear in the names of the various branches of this division of Protestant churches; they have many names, and they differ for the various countries in which those churches were established - the Reformed Church in Switzerland, Germany, and Holland; Huguenots in France; the Presbyterian Church in Scotland and Northern Ireland; in England, the Puritans and the Congregational and Baptist Churches (collectively also called "separatists" from the English orthodox church, which was the Church of England). The Church of England (Episcopal Church in the United States after the Revolutionary War) originally was much like the Lutheran Church in creed, but later made changes under the influence of Calvinism.

The Reformed Church soon became the official church of some of the other German states and free cities, most notably the Palatinate and Brandenburg, whose princes were among the seven Electors of the Emperor. The official position of this church was not protected by the provisions of the treaty of Augsburg, and thus new and additional religious friction was generated, primarily with the Catholics, but incidentally with the Lutherans. Although none who belonged to other churches were forcefully driven out of the states and cities which adopted the Reformed Church, there was discrimination against them, especially by the use of government resources to subsidize the Reformed Church and by seizure of some other church property. Naturally there were some antagonistic feelings between even the Lutheran and Reformed Churches.

The introduction of Calvinism into the Northern Netherlands provided a spark that led to their independence. The Netherlands, or low countries, had originally consisted of a number of small states in the Frankish Kingdom. By one means or another, they had been acquired over the years by the French Duchy of Burgundy (and thus became detached from the Holy Roman Empire. (The Duchy of Burgundy, in north-eastern France, was never part of the ancient Kingdom of Burgundy, which lay in what is now southeastern France.) By marriage, inheritance, and international agreements the Netherlands had come to the Emperor Charles V and to his son, King Philip II of Spain, separate from the Duchy of Burgundy. The Netherlands then included southern states which comprise modern Belgium; they were more French in character than German, unlike the wholly-German northern states which comprise the modern Netherlands. King Philip II established a tyrannical military dictatorship in the Northern Netherlands to suppress rising Protestantism, and that brought on a revolution. Seven of the northern states, led by Holland and Zeeland, joined together to resist the Spanish tyrant, and in the year 1579 they declared their independence, under the leadership of a German prince, William of Orange (the first of that line). There was intermittent warfare for seventy more years before their independence was recognized, but during most of that period the Netherlands was independent in fact and it became a great maritime power. Defeats of the Spanish navy by the English fleet, as well as by the Dutch fleet, contributed to an early Spanish withdrawal.

A third manifestation of the Protestant Reformation was in the Anabaptists. In the German states, including Switzerland and Holland, Lutheranism and Calvinism stimulated more radical members of the clergy to advocate even more sweeping changes in religious, and sometimes in political and social, institutions and customs. One of the few common denominators of their opinions was the concept that only believers should become members of the church; hence, that only adults who are old enough to be responsible should be baptized as members of the church, upon taking their Christian vows at that time; and hence, infant baptism should be abandoned, except possibly as signifying only the giving of a name. However, some also held radical views on political, as well as religious freedom, and they helped to encourage the peasants to revolt. Some believed in more personal liberty, including polygamy. Because of extremism and fanaticism of many, the German people, Protestants as well as Catholics abhorred all of these sects and lumped them together under one title, "Anabaptists", which was the most reprehensible religious epithet that they could think of. That epithet had been used in early times by the Bishop of Rome to stigmatize a certain group of early Christians who held similar views on baptism.

The Anabaptists did not survive, but some of their ideas did. In the area of religion, their concept of baptism later affected the practices of many churches, especially the Baptist Church. The Mennonites are the only example of a comprehensive continuance of their purely religious beliefs, although modified.

The Mennonites were a Christian sect which originated in northern Germany in the middle of the 16th century and spread throughout the German states. The sect was founded by a former Catholic priest, a Hollander named Menno Simons. His fundamental ideas were clear and definite; they have survived among the Mennonites down to the present day, although they have divided into a number of sects, including the Amish, who differ on details. He not only opposed infant baptism and believed in adult baptism upon profession of faith, but he advocated a rigorous adherence to the teachings of Christ in living here on earth, including in particular, living a simple austere life, with love of one's fellow-man, non-violence, and no killing - - and this means no personal killing and no participation in group fighting, including warfare. (The Quakers agree with these principles.) There are other special beliefs of a doctrinal nature, some insignificant and some merely curious (such as refusing to take an oath or assume office as a government official) and some with which we must generally take exception, such as opposition to science and advanced education. One should respect and be impressed with their stands against materialism, violence, and killing; perhaps they are right on these subjects and other Christians are wrong.

Returning to the German Empire in the early 17th century, we find that it was composed of almost 300 states and free cities, each virtually independent. The Emperor was no more than a figure-head, symbolizing a theoretical unity that had long since ceased to exist. Germany was not only fragmented and disunited, but was almost in a state of anarchy. The intensity of antagonism between Catholic and Protestant states and cities had led to the creation of two opposing confederations: the Protestant Union and the Catholic League. Civil religious war was approaching.

Events in the Kingdom of Bohemia soon led to the terrible Thirty Years' War (1618 - 1648). The Emperor and his Hapsburg relatives attempted to force the Bohemian Diet to accept, as their next King, a member of the Hapsburg family; their main purpose being to suppress rising Protestantism in Bohemia through him. The Diet, composed of the Bohemian nobles, traditionally elected their kings. They rejected the Hapsburg and offered the crown to Frederick V, the young Calvinist Elector of the Palatinate, who was also head of the Protestant Union. He accepted. He was subsequently called the Winter King, because he was the ruler of Bohemia for less than a year. Both he and the Bohemian nobles knew there might be war, but they expected assistance from England, because he had married a daughter of King James I of England.

The Catholic League, under the leadership of the Emperor, immediately started war. Their army, composed mainly of Bavarians led by a General Tilly, invaded Bohemia, defeated the Protestant army, dethroned Frederick, and placed the Hapsburg nominee on the Bohemian throne. The new king confiscated the lands of Protestant nobles, ruthlessly suppressed the Protestant religion, and gave the Bohemian Protestants the choice of accepting Catholicism or leaving the country, pursuant to the terms of the treaty of Augsburg. Some of the Lutheran states and cities, including Saxony, had not joined the defense against the Catholics, despite their membership in the Protestant Union; they were half-antagonistic to the Calvinists, as well as afraid of Catholic power. Nor did England join in defense. The Protestant army was driven into the Palatinate, where it made an unsuccessful stand against the Catholic army, which had now received the addition of a Spanish army sent by their king to assist his Hapsburg relatives. Frederick found temporary refuge in the Netherlands, and the Protestants in the Palatinate had to face reversion to Catholicism or leave the country.

At this point the war might have been ended, with all German Protestants completely at the mercy of the Catholics. But fear of re-Catholization of Germany resulted in the declaration of intent to support the Protestants by the Protestant countries of Denmark, England, and the Netherlands. Support by the latter two did not amount to much, but the King of Denmark soon sent an army to assist the remaining Protestant army. The Catholic armies were now strengthened by a new army of mercenaries recruited and led by a Protestant Bohemian noble named Wallenstein, who sought his own aggrandizement. The combined Danish-German Protestant armies were overwhelmingly defeated, and Wallenstein proved that he was a military genius. But he would never obtain the Emperor's trust and confidence.

Again the war might have been ended, but new support of the Protestant Union sustained it. By this time the Lutheran princes, including the Duke of Saxony, gave full support to the Union, fearing the result for themselves if there were a total Catholic victory. Then also, Gustavus Adolphus, King of Lutheran Sweden, came to the rescue, with financial assistance from France, although not with the full acceptance of the German Protestant princes, because they feared that he wished to annex some German territory. Gustavus proved to be a military genius to rival Wallenstein; he led his well-trained and better-equipped army, with the aid of the German-Protestant armies, through a series of victories over the Catholic armies of Tilly and Wallenstein and their Spanish ally. However, both Gustavus and Tilly died in battle, and Wallenstein was assassinated by some of his own mercenaries. But not before the Protestants had regained control of all of their lost territory and had invaded Bavaria. Success did not last long after the death of the Swedish king, and they lost most of their gains to the Catholic armies. At this point, the Emperor negotiated a peace treaty containing mild terms, with the Protestant Electors of Brandenburg and Saxony, but it was not accepted by the other Protestant princes.

Now, at last, the French intervened directly on the side of the Protestants, pretending to save them from the Hapsburgs. The French King's minister, the Machiavellian Cardinal Richelieu, controlled French policy. Although he was a Catholic prince and was responsible for persecuting Protestants in France, he allegedly set out to defend German Protestants in their freedom of religion. Actually it was French policy to do anything they could to weaken the Hapsburgs, the Empire, Austria, and Spain. Besides, it was their object to gain some German territory. After several bloody years, the combined French-Swedish-German armies finally defeated the Catholic forces, but both sides had had all the punishment they wanted to take. During this period, the French had also warred with the Spanish.

The Peace of Westphalia, which followed, reflected French and Swedish objectives, as well as peace terms between the German Catholics and Protestants. As between the latter, the treaty provided as follows: (1) Henceforth the Calvinist Reformed Church would be subject to the same privileges as the Lutheran Church and the Catholic Church under the Peace of Augsburg - - each to have equal rights. (2) Secularized church lands were to remain in possession of those who held them in the year 1624 (meaning that the Protestant princes would retain much of the land that they had previously taken from the Catholic Church, but the Catholic Church would keep all that they had been able to recapture during the first six years of the war, as in the Palatinate and Bohemia). (3) Bavaria would retain the part of the Palatinate it had seized during the war (the Upper Palatinate, to the east of the remaining Palatinate and north of Bavaria). The other provisions of the treaty included the following: (1) Observance of all provisions of the treaty would be guaranteed and supervised by France and Sweden (a clear infringement of the Empire's sovereignty).

(2) The independence of the Swiss Confederation and the northern Netherlands was recognized. (3) France would receive the church states (cities) of Metz, Toul, and Verdun in Lorraine (which it had seized several years before the war - - this gave it a clear title). (4) France would receive all of the Hapsburg possessions in Alsace. (The boundaries of such possessions were complex. Eventually the French would succeed in taking over all of Alsace, stretching their territory to the Rhine River, south of the Palatinate to the boundary with Switzerland.) (5) Sweden would receive from Brandenburg the church states (cities) of Bremen and Verden and the western part of Pomerania, giving it land on the south shore of the Baltic Sea and along the Lower Oder and Elbe Rivers. (Later Sweden was forced to return it by a stronger Prussia, which superseded Brandenburg.) (6) The German North Sea and Baltic ports of Hamburg, Bremen, and Lubeck were made free ports, but Sweden and Denmark won a degree of control over them. (This too, did not last.) (7) Brandenburg received certain lands in the Elbe River Valley (previously owned by the Catholic Church), and a guarantee of its territorial rights in Eastern Pomerania, in consideration for giving up to Sweden its claim to Western Pomerania. Brandenburg thus became the largest state in the empire except Austria.

The Thirty Years' War was one of the most important milestones in the long struggle for religious and political freedom in Western civilization, costly though it was. It was the last of the civil religious wars in Germany, and the foundation for German religious freedom. History shows that establishment of religious freedom generally preceded establishment of political freedom. Thus this civil war was even more meaningful than the Civil War in the United States, more than two centuries later, because its consequences were more universal. The benefits of the Protestant Reformation were preserved for all mankind, when they were threatened with complete destruction. Except for the German and Scandinavian states and Hungary, Protestantism was crushed forever in all of Continental Europe by despotic combinations of Catholic Church and state power. In France, after long years of milder struggles, the infamous King Louis XIV, in the year 1685, gave French Protestants the choice of accepting Catholicism or leaving France. Those who chose to keep their faith fled to the German states. In England, the Protestant Church of England remained under the absolute control of the Kings of England for some years; not until Cromwell's revolution did the Calvinists gain a foothold there. In Scotland, the struggle to establish the Calvinist Presbyterian Church was not quite as difficult. Whether Protestantism, which originated in the German states, could have been maintained anywhere, if it had been destroyed there, may be questioned. While there was never any apparent danger of its destruction in Switzerland, that would have been a small base from which to spread, or maintain the faith. And the Netherlands was long in danger of destruction of Protestantism by Catholic Spanish tyrants even more determined than the German Emperor and those powerful German princes who continued in the Catholic faith.

The Peace of Westphalia also served to declare German independence from the Pope and to provide the example for future independence of all nations from the Pope. Thus the German people, who originally created in The Holy Roman Empire the combination of Catholic and secular power, finally led the way in separating it. The Pope did not like this new condition, and he declared the peace terms null and void. However, the German Catholic princes accepted the peace terms, because they had to. It was ironic that this condition was created and insured for the future upon the basis of French Catholic power.

It was true legally, of course, that freedom in choice of religion rested only in the princes who were heads of states and free cities, and not in the people individually. But indirectly they had a choice, even though the consequences were painful, because they were free to move to another state or city which practiced the creed of their choice. And despite the general law, it was not long before individual freedom of religion was established by edicts of many of the ruling German princes, as their hot tempers cooled. It is probable that the long terrible suffering of the German people in religious warfare brought most of them to their senses.

The fact that the war showed the pitiful weakness of the German states, in comparison with the smaller but unified French nation, did not serve to bring about any movement towards unification and concentration of inherently greater German power. The German princes were too selfish individually, and they held their people in complete subjugation. It would take more than a century of suffering from continuing French aggression, before a new able autocratic regime would arise in Prussia to lead the German states in a violent comeback, and more than two centuries to establish a unified German nation. Yet it was this very weakness that had permitted the establishment of Protestantism in Germany in the first place, and eventually, its continuance.

The costs to the German people of The Thirty Years' War are sad to contemplate. Warfare was waged viciously and savagely by armies of both sides; no chivalry had been saved from the days of knighthood, if there ever really was any. Armies were raised by individual generals; they were fed and clothed by forced requisitioning of supplies, and were paid from tributes levied on their enemies. Friendly areas suffered in maintenance of their armies, almost as much as enemy areas. During the war the armies fought back and forth over all of Germany (excluding Austria), but Bohemia, the Palatinate, and Wurttemberg apparently suffered most. Cities were often besieged, and the inhabitants suffered from starvation; and when the cities were taken they were pillaged and burned. Rural areas were similarly treated. Soldiers were unrestrained in their mistreatment of defeated enemy combatants and non-combatants; murder, torture, and rape were common. Pestilence struck the people, especially the plague, and killed many. One estimate was the overall population of Germany was reduced during the war by two-thirds; another estimate was that the population of the rural areas was reduced by 40%, and of the cities, one-third. Another estimate was that the population of the Palatinate was reduced from 500,000 to 50,000; the population of Wurttemberg, from 400,000 to 48,000. Property damage was incalculable. It was said that the countryside, during the later years of the war, became almost a desert. It would appear that this war was relatively the worst in history, in terms of death and destruction and cruelty.

The German people, however, have always had immense vitality and energy. They went about recreating their rural areas and cities, their agriculture, trade, and culture, with miraculous results, such as we have seen in our own lifetime in the German recovery from the devastation of World War II. Even their population returned by 1700 to the pre-war level, it has been estimated. But this was not be the last of such devastations; during the next century the French would continue to ravage German territory from time to time, especially in the Rhineland.

Louis XIV was King of France from 1643 to 1715, having become King when he was only five years old. After the death of his Prime Minister, Cardinal Mazarin, in 1761, he exercised sole power with little advice from his ministers. The phrase, "I am the State", was coined for him. He considered that everything in France belonged to him, including the lives of its people, and that he governed by the will of God, and was answerable only to him. He adopted for France the original concept of The Holy Roman Empire as to unity of church and state, with one religion; therefore, he eliminated Protestantism in France. He desired to advance the glory of France, and accomplished this objective to a considerable degree. He built huge palaces, gathered fabulous art collections, and promoted the arts. French art, manners, and style of dress were copied by all Europe. He sought colonial expansion, including in America, and to extend the entire eastern boundary of France to the Rhine, which he claimed was the natural boundary. He also aspired to obtain the Spanish crown, like Charles V had done, because he also had married a daughter of the King of Spain. These ambitions brought France into almost continual warfare during his long reign. He loved war and the fame that it brought. During this period, France was the greatest military power in Europe, but its power was not sufficient to win all of its wars, because of coalitions of other powers whose interests he challenged. Huge expenditures for war, palaces, and the arts almost bankrupted France. Opposition within France to the absolute power of the King, and the way it was used, commenced during the reign of Louis XIV, and grew until finally the monarchy was overthrown in the French Revolution in 1789.

Between 1667 and 1672, France succeeded by armed invasion in annexing some Spanish-owned cities in Flanders and seized the German Duchy of Lorraine (which is north of Alsace and west of the Rhine). In 1672, a French army invaded the Netherlands, with intent to annex all of its territory west of the Rhine. Prince William of Orange, commander of the Netherlands army (and later, chief of state in the Netherlands), temporarily defeated the French by opening the dikes and flooding the countryside, at the cost of sterilizing the soil for some years. Then he obtained help from Brandenburg, Austria, and Spain (the former enemy of the Netherlands), and succeeded in mounting a strong resistance and prolonging the war. Eventually France agreed to the Peace of Nymwegen (1678), abandoning its attempt to annex territory of the Netherlands, but obtaining some territory previously held by Spain west of the Rhine.

After the French war with the Netherlands, the German Emperor made a new defensive alliance with Spain, aimed against the threat of French aggression. Immediately Louis showed his displeasure by annexing some more German cities in Alsace, and by sending an army into the Palatinate to plunder and destroy property, and terrorize the inhabitants (1674). This was called the first devastation of the Palatinate by the French. During this invasion and reign of terror, the Count Palatine (Elector) was forced to pay money to the French as a tribute.

During the next few years, Louis contented himself with seizing the rest of the German state of Alsace, including Strasburg, its principal city.

In 1688, Louis again sent an army into the Palatinate, ostensibly to enforce a claim to rule it by his sister-in-law, but actually to gain for France permanent possession of the part which lay west of the Rhine. After The Thirty Years' War, the Count Palatine had been Karl Ludwig (Charles Louis), son of Frederick V, the Winter King, who died during the war. Karl Ludwig had died about 1685, leaving no son; a daughter had married the Duke of Orleans, brother of Louis XIV (whose claim to the crown was advanced by Louis). This claim was invalid, because, under German law, succession in the nobility was solely in the male line. One Philip William, who was a cousin of Karl Ludwig, had become the lawful Count Palatine and Elector.

This time, France faced a more powerful coalition of powers, the League of Augsburg, created in the preceding year, consisting of Sweden, Spain, Austria, the German Emperor, and the rulers of several German states, including Saxony, Bavaria, and the Palatinate. They came to the assistance of the Palatinate, but were not immediately successful in repelling the French, who continued to occupy the Palatinate. In 1689, the league was joined by England, the Netherlands, and Savoy (then an independent state between France and Italy). With their aid, France was finally defeated in 1697, after ten years of fighting. This war is sometimes known as the War of the Orleans Succession.

During this war, the Palatinate was devastated by the French a second time. Property destruction was worse than the first time in 1674; it was even worse than the destruction during the Thirty Years' War. And the crimes against noncombatants by the French army rivaled such crimes during that war, but the population did not shrink so much. Many cities and towns were almost completely destroyed, including the cities of Heidelberg, Mannheim, Worms, and Speyer. Historic monuments were destroyed, and art treasures were stolen, if not destroyed. The destruction of Heidelberg in 1693 included burning of the Count's grand castle (one of the most magnificent in the Empire) and Heidelberg University (the oldest in the Empire except Prague and Vienna). The old castle's ruins, restored in a small part, may be visited by tourists today on the heights overlooking Heidelberg. It is alleged that Louis gave the university's library to the Vatican in Rome. In the rural areas, crops and animals were taken or destroyed (more than once in many places) and buildings were burned. French armies also invaded and similarly ravaged other parts of the Empire and the Netherlands during this war, although it appears that destruction in the Palatinate was the worst.

After the combined armies of the Grand Alliance defeated the French in the Netherlands, Louis agreed to humiliating terms in the Peace of Ryswik (1697). France was required to give up Lorraine and all other German territories seized during the war and immediately before, except Alsace. It is said that the terms would have been harsher, except for the absorption of the Empire in repulsing one of the many Turkish invasions that then threatened Austria.

Here it should be of interest to pause and tell something about William III of England and the Netherlands, who provided both political and military leadership of the Grand Alliance. He is an authentic hero in history, because he checked Louis XIV, reduced rising French power, protected the Empire and the Netherlands, saved Protestantism, and assured future freedom of religion in both the English-speaking and the German-speaking world.

Prince William III of Orange was the son of the second Prince William and grandson of the first Prince William of Orange, both of whom were the elected chief executive of the Netherlands (Stadtholder). His mother was Mary, daughter of King Charles I of England. When young, he had poor health and was undersized. With a strict Calvinist upbringing, he overcame his physical weakness and acquired great self-control, physical and moral courage, and sense of high purpose. He was born a few days after his father died, and had no official status in the Netherlands, except as commander of the army, when called upon to resist the French invasion in 1672. Because of his competence, he was soon elected Stadtholder for life. By his statesmanship, courage, and military leadership, he got help and succeeded in thwarting that French aggression against the Netherlands.

Prince William married his first cousin, Mary, daughter of King James II of England, and then heiress to the English throne. Later, King James II turned Catholic and became most unpopular in England, not only for that reason, but also because he tried to establish his power over Parliament, in the manner of long-bygone kings. After his first wife died, he remarried and had a son, James, who superseded his Protestant half-sister, Mary, as heir to the English throne. Prince William impressed the English king's opposition with his great ability to lead the defense against the French; that, combined with his wife's position in the royal line, led them to invite him to come to England with a Dutch army to overthrow James II, his own uncle and father-in-law. They had no better way of dethroning James and crowning William. William accepted the invitation; one of his reasons was to strengthen resistance against Louis XIV and his aims. Although he brought an army to England, they did not have to fight. A majority of the English people and their army came to his support, and James fled to France. The English Parliament then made William their King, and his wife, Mary, their Queen - - to be joint rulers of England and the United Kingdom. This explains how England, as well as the Netherlands, entered the Grand Alliance against France in 1689.

England was not able immediately to go to the assistance of the German states in the war then raging in the Palatinate, because the Irish revolted under the leadership of James II, who they still acknowledged to be their king (they were Catholics). King William led an army into Ireland, defeated the Irish army, forced James to flee back to France, and ended the Irish rebellion. A faction in Scotland also gave some trouble, but it was more easily suppressed. Hence in 1692, when the French turned and invaded the Netherlands, William was able to lead the combined forces there against the French and defeat them in battle.

William's final struggle with Louis XIV involved the succession of Louis' grandson to the Spanish throne, of which more later. He died just after that war began, so that he did not see the final victory for the causes for which he gave his whole life.

William and Mary were childless, so the English crown passed to the next in the royal line, Queen Anne. Her several children all died young. Hence, the crown then went to Prince George of the German state of Hanover. George I is of interest, because he was a grandson of Frederick V of the Palatinate (the Winter King) and his English wife, Elizabeth, and also because all the English kings and queens since then have been their lineal descendants. In World War I, the royal family's name was changed to "Windsor", because of anti-German sentiment in England.

In the Netherlands, the democratic government they established became combined with a limited monarchy in the House of Orange. The people wanted to show their gratitude to that family, particularly to William I and William III, for leadership in establishing and preserving their independence and freedom, both political and religious.

When King Charles II of Spain died childless in 1701, he bequeathed his crown to his descendant, Philip, Duke of Anjou, who was also a son of the heir to the French throne (the future Louis XV), but subject to the condition that the thrones of Spain and France should remain separate forever. The lawful heir to the Spanish throne was Archduke Charles, heir to the throne of Austria (he later became Emperor of The Holy Roman Empire, Charles VI). This created a great turmoil in Europe, not only because of the legal question, but also because, in either case, the balance of power in Europe would be upset - - a problem that has troubled Europe continuously since Charles V, the German Emperor, was also King of Spain. France did not want another combination of German and Spanish power; England and the German states did not want a combination of French and Spanish power. Louis had his grandson accept the Spanish crown, and he became King Philip V.

Soon thereafter, Philip V granted special privileges to French merchants to trade in the Spanish empire, such as theretofore had been enjoyed only by English and Dutch merchants. Then French troops seized several Dutch forts on the Netherlands' border with the Spanish Netherlands (modern Belgium). This seemed to justify fears that the French would act in combination with the Spanish, even though they did not have one king. Hence, a new Grand Alliance was formed by England, the Netherlands, Austria, Brandenburg, Portugal, and Savoy. No other German state was in the alliance, but the participation of Austria naturally meant that the German Emperor was on the side of the allies. Peculiarly, however, Bavaria became the ally of the French this time, because of her jealousy of Austria.

When the Grand Alliance prepared for war, a French army invaded the Netherlands and carried the war to the Allies. The war was fought largely in the Netherlands, the Spanish Netherlands, and Bavaria. Although the German states in the Rhineland were not participants in this war, French armies crossed that area in their campaigns, and in 1707 they again devastated that part of the Palatinate which lay west of the Rhine (which Louis coveted). The allied armies, brilliantly led by the English Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene of Savoy (for Austria), won victory after victory over the French-Bavarian armies, the most famous being at Blenheim in Bavaria. Although the French were not conclusively defeated, both sides became exhausted and negotiated a peace in 1713/4, under which Philip V kept the Spanish throne, but renounced his rights to the French throne; and Austria was given the Spanish Netherlands, Milan, Naples, and Sardinia. Shortly thereafter Louis XIV died, and French power declined. He had accomplished some of his goals, but he had not obtained possession of German Lorraine and the Palatinate west of the Rhine, nor the Spanish Netherlands, nor the portion of the Netherlands west of the Rhine.

By the year 1708, the Palatinate had been thoroughly crushed by the recurrent devastations by the French armies of Louis XIV. Added to this woe was the return of the Palatinate to Catholicism by edict of Philip William, first of the new line of Counts (Electors) who came from Bavaria about 1685. The Palatinate had been Protestant since the year 1556 - - Lutheran until 1561, and Reformed after that year. However, Philip William was lenient and did not force the Protestants to become Catholics or leave the country, as he was authorized to do under the Peace of Augsburg and Westphalia. His son, John William, who became Count Palatine after his death in 1690, was different. He seized much of the Protestant church property and gave it to the Catholic Church; moreover, he apparently forced some of the Protestant nobility to leave the country and seized their lands. Yet it is reported that in 1705, he decreed religious tolerance for all; perhaps this was a belated attempt to repair some of the damages to the state.

It is said that the Catholic Counts of the Palatinate attempted to emulate King Louis XIV in their style of living and in the construction and furnishing of their palaces - - the new palace in Mannheim which in 1720 replaced the old castle in Heidelberg (destroyed by the French in 1693), and their summer palace at Schwetzingen. Taxes were increased to provide for such expenditures, and of course the state contributed to the extension and maintenance of the Catholic Church from tax revenues. The tax burden became almost unbearable, especially on the peasants.

The peasants had been crushed in the Peasants War, as previously related, and there is no evidence that their status had been improved since that time. It has been noted that one could obtain manumission of his serfdom to emigrate to America, provided he paid the tax of up to 10% of the value of the property he took with him. And it had been true for some time that a peasant could buy his freedom if he could get the money, and then he could go to a city and be a free man (eventually even becoming a burgher).

This brings us to the point in the early 18th century when the exodus from the Rhineland began. It adds to our understanding of why the Pennsylvania Dutch came to America (see section, "More on the Pennsylvania Dutch"). It also provides a means for an increased understanding of the character and culture of the Pennsylvania Dutch. In addition, it should provide, up to a point, a basis for some understanding of the forces that shaped subsequent German history, and also world history.

A map of the German states in the early 18th century is provided on page 57. The area from which most emigrants went to America in the 18th century is enclosed by a fringed border. Boundaries are not precisely drawn, but are approximately correct. This map includes the principal states of princes of the Catholic Church, such as the Archbishops of Cologne, Trier, and Mainz, and the Bishops of Munster, Speyer, and Augsburg. Free cities and very small states are not shown, in order to avoid overburdening the map. The principal cities may be found on any modern map of East and West Germany, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland. Also not shown are subsidiary states (states within a state), nor non-German possessions of German princes, such as the Kingdom of Hungary and certain Italian states subject to the Archduke of Austria and the rest of the Hapsburgs.

Following is a very brief summary of German history from the early 18th century to the present day:

The Margraves of Brandenburg, who belonged to the Lutheran Hohenzollern family of southwestern Germany, assumed the title of King of Prussia, from their possession of the state of East Prussia, in Poland. Not long thereafter all of their possessions became known collectively as Prussia. Prussia soon became a competitor of Austria for leadership of the German states. Prussia emerged victorious, and in 1871, the King of Prussia also became Emperor of a united German Empire which excluded Austria. The Emperor was also called "Kaiser", which is the German word for "Caesar", in memory of the glory of The Holy Roman Empire.

The Archduke of Austria assumed the title of Emperor of the Austrian-Hungarian Empire after the dissolution of The Holy Roman Empire by edict of the French Emperor Napoleon, in 1804. That empire then included the Kingdoms of Bohemia and Hungary, part of Poland, and a number of small states and cities in Italy and the Balkans. As a result, the German people therein were outnumbered by peoples of other origins - Hungarians, Czechs, Slavs, Poles, Italians, Croats, and Serbs. This was the cause of continual and rising internal difficulties, one of which escalated into World War I, upon the termination of which the remainder of that empire was fragmented along the lines of racial origin.

During the remainder of the 18th century, frequent wars continued, but most were fought in the eastern part of Germany. France continued to pursue its policy of aggression against the German states. It fought Austria in several wars, in one of which it acquired the German state of Lorraine (1735). However, for a change, France came to the aid of Austria in the Seven Years' War (1756 - 1763) - - the last of three wars between Austria and Prussia, following Prussia's seizure of Silesia, then indirectly a possession of Austria. In this fiercely-fought war, Prussia, under the leadership of King Frederick the Great, took on the combined powers of Austria, France, and Russia, with most of the other German states aiding Austria, but a few aiding Prussia. The Prussian armies won great victories, but also suffered some severe defeats. But Prussia kept Silesia and won the respect and fear of the rest of Europe. France's assistance of its old enemy, Austria, was based simply on the precept of maintaining a balance of power in Europe by ganging-up on the most powerful state. However, England gave financial support to Prussia throughout this war, in pursuance of its self-interest against France. While France was kept busy on the Continent, England fought her and took her possessions in India and North America (the last of the French and Indian wars).

After the French Revolution of 1789, France followed the same aggressive policy against the German states in war after war, commencing even with the revolutionary government in the 1790's and continuing after the rise of General Napoleon Bonaparte to be Emperor of France. Napoleon took advantage of the enmity between Prussia and Austria to attack and conquer them separately, after which he dissolved The Holy Roman Empire, dismembered Prussia, annexed that remaining part of Germany which lay west of the Rhine, and remade the map of Germany. But he also did similarly in Italy, Spain, and the Netherlands. Being defeated by England at sea, he sought to conquer her by stifling trade between her and all of Europe. When Russia refused to participate in that design, Napoleon led his Grand Army into Russia and suffered his first great defeat on land in the Winter snows, when Russia adopted a "scorched-earth" policy. Shortly thereafter, Prussia combined with Austria and Russia to defeat Napoleon's reduced army and send him into exile. After he escaped and returned to France, Prussia assisted Great Britain in again defeating him at Waterloo and exiling him permanently.

Some years later, in 1870, the French Emperor, Napoleon III, a nephew of Napoleon Bonaparte, undertook to again invade Germany and conquer Prussia. This time the Prussian armies quickly overwhelmed the French armies in a short war, repossessed Alsace and part of Lorraine, levied a fine on France of about one billion dollars, and occupied part of France until the fine was paid (about three years). This effectively ended direct French aggression against Germany, but the blow to French pride incurred their continued enmity and desire for revenge, and this led to the establishment of a coalition of nations against Germany (France, Russia, and later, Great Britain) under the balance-of-power precept, which brought about World War I in 1914.

Prussia, like Austria, enlarged its domain progressively. In the late 17th century, Brandenburg had driven Sweden and Denmark out of Western Pomerania and the cities ceded to them at the end of The Thirty Years' War, and had renounced the overlordship of Poland in East Prussia. In the 18th century, in addition to taking Silesia from Austria, Prussia added to its lands on the eastern border through the partition of Poland with Russia and Austria, thus conjoining Prussia proper with the rest of the Prussian Kingdom. After Napoleon's defeat, Prussia, with the approval of Great Britain and Austria, obtained the German lands west of the Rhine (excluding Belgium) which had been annexed by Napoleon; this accession, although separated from Prussia by other German states, later became important to Prussia when it was industrialized. Prussia did not recover German Alsace and Lorraine at that time, because neither Great Britain nor Austria would approve. In the mid-19th century, Prussia annexed the neighboring German states of Holstein and Schleswig after successive short wars with Denmark and Austria. At the same time, Prussia peaceably annexed the German states of Hanover, Nassau, and Hesse-Cassel, and the free city of Frankfurt. After the Franco-Prussian War in 1870, Alsace and Lorraine were taken from France.

After the defeat of Napoleon, all of the German states, including Austria and Prussia, formed a loose German Confederation, which had about as little meaning as The Holy Roman Empire in its last stage. This confederation was destroyed in 1866, when most of the members sided with Austria in its fight with Prussia over Schleswig and Holstein. It was succeeded by a North German Confederation, composed of Prussia and the remaining northern states which had not been annexed by Prussia. The southern German states, excluding Austria, remained in a customs' union with the members of the North German Confederation, and most of them made secret military alliances with Prussia. These arrangements were soon superceded by the formation of the German Empire in 1871, dominated by Prussia, following the short Franco-Prussian War. There had long been a nationalistic fervor among the German people, but the struggle between Prussia and Austria for dominance and Prussia's insistence on dictating the terms of union, had delayed unification. The heart-warming experience for all Germans, when Prussia evened the score with France in behalf of all Germany, was all that was needed to obtain agreement of the member states to unite on Prussian terms. While the various steps in the last half of the 19th century, leading to German unification, occurred during the long reign of King William of Prussia, the first to become the German Emperor, the person almost wholly responsible was his Chancellor (prime minister), Otto von Bismarck, who served from 1862 to 1890. Bismarck acted with a combination of determination, wisdom, restraint, boldness, and unscrupulousness, with a fine sense for timing, to achieve his goal.

It was Bismarck's policy to cultivate friendship with Russia. Accordingly, he renounced all ambitions in Eastern Europe, including the Balkans, and maintained a military alliance with Russia. Unfortunately for Germany, the Emperor William II, grandson of William I, did not follow the advice of his grandfather and Bismarck to continue that policy, but chose in 1890 not to renew the Russian alliance, deeming it to be incompatible with treaty obligations to Austria-Hungary, whose interest was opposed to the growing extension of Russian influence in the Balkans. (This is not the place to describe continuing conflicts in the Balkans during the 18th, 19th, and early 20th century, involving Russia, Turkey, Great Britain, Austria-Hungary, Italy, and the small Balkan nations who became independent of Turkey. But Kaiser William II was right in principle; he had to choose between Russia and Austria-Hungary.) Thereafter, Russia entered into a fateful military alliance with France. Some time later, William II aggravated relations with Russia by becoming friendly with Turkey, in order to aid German commerce. Germany and Austria-Hungary, finding themselves without friends and almost surrounded by enemies, made a military alliance. Later, Italy entered this alliance, because it also opposed Russian aggression in the Balkans. When World War I came, Italy refused to honor this commitment and entered the war on the other side, thinking it might profit more.

Prussia's, and later, Germany's military strength was based upon a large standing army with universal military service, a professional officer-class of great skill and dedication, and a strong well-trained reserve-force, all founded upon the general conviction that Germany lived in the midst of mortal enemies, among whom the law of the jungle persisted. In the light of German experience, especially with France, this is understandable. This strength was made possible only with a strong central government, strict economy in government, and eventually by the growth in industrial power. Germany's military strength was always land-bound. When it belatedly set out to build a strong navy, it could not outstrip Great Britain, which enlarged its navy to keep ahead. In time this led to the necessity for Germany to rely on submarines for sea-power. Yet, until the rise of Hitler after World War I, Germany unquestionably had only defensive motives in maintaining a large military machine.

Industrial and commercial progress was belatedly speeded up in Prussia, commencing in the mid-19th century. After unification, Germany's progress was even faster, and it was not long before Germany was the greatest industrial nation in Europe, and was challenging Great Britain for world markets for its products. This was the reason why Germany imitated England, France, the Netherlands, and Belgium, in a belated gathering of foreign possessions in Africa and the Pacific (possessions which were lost in World War I). But competition for world trade also injured relations with Great Britain, and this, combined with naval competition, resulted in Great Britain joining the military alliance of France and Russia against Germany.

During the entire 19th century, the growth of a nationalistic spirit was accompanied by a desire for democracy and freedom among the German people, including the thinkers, students, and even the common people - ideas that were becoming common in all of Western civilization following the American and French revolutions. However, the princes and the landed nobility kept a firm control of the governments of the various states and generally opposed liberal political and social ideas as long as they could. The Austrian and Prussian governments were more reactionary than the southern state governments, but at least, the Prussian kings were more progressive in philosophy than their landed nobles. The German people did not revolt violently, as the French did more than once, probably because they had a more patient temperament, believed in law and order, and were not as badly oppressed as the French were in the 18th century. This resulted generally in slower political and social progress in Germany than in France.

The principal political reform in each state was the creation of a legislative assembly elected by the people, with powers limited in varying degree. Serfdom (bondage) was eliminated in the mid-19th century, and the peasants were permitted to own land. Also the lines between the social classes were made more flexible, although the nobility was preserved and they were permitted to continue to own entailed estates (not subject to sale) until after World War I.

In the year 1848, there occurred a relatively peaceful revolution that had a great impact eventually, although it was unfruitful at the time. Representatives elected by the people in all of the German states met in Frankfurt, framed a proposed liberal constitution for a united Germany under a limited monarchy, and offered the crown to the King of Prussia. He refused the offer, because he was not yet ready to accept a democratic form of government, as well as because the whole proposal was opposed by the princes of the other states. In some of the states, participants in this movement were jailed; in a few states there were feeble attempts at armed revolution which were quickly and easily suppressed.

Industrial and commercial growth brought into existence a new class of capitalistic barons and large increases in the working and middle classes in the cities. Working-class conditions created new tensions and conflicts. Karl Marx, a German in exile in London, formulated the philosophy of Socialism, based upon conditions in industrial Germany in the mid-19th century. These ideas, without revolution, formed the basis for the creation of a socialist political party in Germany that obtained considerable strength in the legislative assemblies of the Empire and most of the German states. Bismarck felt compelled to support some of their advocated reforms, and hence, in the 1880's Germany adopted several measures for the benefit of labor, including health insurance and old-age pensions - - measures which were not considered seriously in the United States for decades. This great speed in making social reforms contrasts strangely with the long delay in making social and land reforms in the agricultural area.

Hundreds of thousands of Germans emigrated to the United States in the 19th century, Catholics as well as Protestants, from the cities as well as the farms, and from all parts of Germany. While the major reason was pursuit of greater economic opportunity, there was also the desire for greater political freedom (prior to 1871), and in some cases, the desire to escape compulsory military service. There were many who left Germany after the unsuccessful revolution of 1848. No longer was there a reason for escape from the results of destructive wars. Germany had relative peace in the 19th century after the Napoleonic period; its short wars with Denmark and France were not fought on German soil.

Entering the 20th century, Germany had made great progress in everything. In contrast, Austria-Hungary and Russia were governed by Emperors who were doing their best to keep their countries' institutions the same as in the 18th century. However, in Kaiser William II, Germany also had a doubtful quantity. He was egotistical, flamboyant, short-tempered, and fond of military display; he intended to be every inch an emperor and not to trust affairs to a well-chosen Chancellor, like his grandfather did. Unfortunately, he never had a good, strong Chancellor. Germany, like every major nation in Europe, was burdened heavily by a large military establishment. Preparedness was supposed to be the best insurance against war.

The long period of peace in Germany was broken in 1914 with the outbreak of World War I. This was a senseless, ferocious, long war that brought catastrophe to Europe and terrible consequences for the whole world; the full extent of the consequences is still unknown. Austria-Hungary technically started the war by attempting to punish Serbia for trying to incite revolution by Serbs in Austria-Hungary, including its involvement in the assassination of its crown-prince. But it was Russia, urged on by France, who needlessly made it a general war. (After the war, Russian participation in inciting Serbians in Austria-Hungary to revolt was disclosed.) Kaiser William's attitude was simply, "If Russia and France want to start a general war, Germany is willing and able to finish it". He did not feel like asking Austria-Hungary to back down. The system of alliances came into play automatically, when Russia invaded East Prussia and Austria-Hungary. Once started, the war was impossible to stop short of total defeat for one side or the other. Ultimately the Germans were defeated primarily at sea, when they were deprived of imports of raw materials and food by the British blockade, and by partial failure of Germany's attempted counter-blockade by submarine warfare. The United States foolishly entered the war as a result of the submarine blockade, when its neutral rights under international law were violated more than by reason of Great Britain's sea-blockade. The United States was also influenced by allied propaganda; its moral sensibilities were much keener then than now, since our armed forces adopted German methods of total war in World War II, including submarine warfare and the destruction of industrial cities by bombing from the air. Its attitude should have been, "A curse on both your houses". The United States provided the balance of power that defeated Germany on land; it was brought to bear at the time when the Russians and Italians were defeated and the French troops were rebellious, after a long and valiant defense on French soil, with the important help of the British. If the United States had not entered the war, the allies would have been defeated. Later, by hindsight, considering the results, the opinion of the United States Congress was that it would have been preferable not to have entered World War I (witness the Neutrality Acts of 1935/7 designed to prevent a recurrence, passed after Hitler became Germany's dictator and it was evident that World War II was coming).

After victory, the Allies inflicted harsh, vindictive sentences on Germany, Austria-Hungary, and their allies. However, a similar satisfaction would probably have been levied by the Germans if they had won. These sentences were set forth in so-called "peace treaties", because they were required to be accepted in writing by representatives of the vanquished nations, as dictated by the victors. German acceptance was forced by an allied threat to resume the war if they did not accept, and by continuance of the sea-blockade until acceptance. The allies continued the sea-blockade, starving the German people, for eight months after the armistice, all the while they argued among themselves over the terms of the peace sentences, and until the "treaties" were signed by the German representatives. The United States Senate rejected the Versailles Treaty with Germany, but later approved a separate peace treaty with Germany containing most of the same provisions. It never approved the proposed United States membership in the League of Nations, created to encourage peace among nations by joint action against aggressors, because of reaction against involvement in European wars. Probably the greatest injustice embodied in the Versailles Treaty was the forced acknowledgment, signed by the German representatives, for the benefit of posterity forever, of the falsehood that Germany and her allies were solely responsible for starting the war.

The German Republic, created after the war, did not last long. It was unable to stand the simultaneous strains of new democratic forces, the economic impact of reparations payments, the economic effect of trade-barriers resulting from the severance of other states, the world-wide economic depression of the 1930's, and the insults to national pride in the Versailles Treaty (which weighed more and more heavily as time went by). Although the Allies agreed temporarily to suspension of reparations payments, that was not enough. Adolph Hitler, head of the minority National Socialist Party (Nazis), became Chancellor of the Republic in 1933, as a promised champion and savior of Germany, not without reluctance on the part of many. He soon established himself as a dictator, outlawed free-speech, controlled the press, and created a police state in which it was a crime to dissent. An unprincipled, psychotic demagogue, he created enthusiasm among the masses and in the armed forces for the better part of his program; the bad part was accepted as an unavoidable part of a package, although there was a minority that approved that also.

Hitler abrogated the Versailles Treaty, including the permanent suspension of reparations payments; undertook rearmament of Germany, as well as a large public-works program; and thus created general prosperity. Germany resumed its position as the greatest military power in Europe, as well as its industrial leadership. Hitler then proceeded rapidly to achieve his objectives, not simply to redress the wrongs in the Versailles Treaty, but to conquer all of Europe in the manner of Charlemagne and Napoleon, under the arrogant claim that the Germans are the superior race and should dominate all lesser races. He played on German sentimentality for The Holy Roman Empire. He succeeded in uniting Austria with Germany and in in taking over the territory of the former kingdom of Bohemia from Czechoslovakia without creating a war, probably because some had the feeling that such action was not too unreasonable, but certainly in the hope that Germany would then be satisfied. But this was not enough. By agreement with Dictator Stalin of Russia, Hitler invaded and quickly conquered Poland, while Russia took possession of Eastern Poland and the small countries between Poland and Russia. Hitler also made an alliance with Italy and Japan, supporting their aims for conquests. France and Great Britain challenged the invasion of Poland and prepared for war. Germany soon conquered and occupied France, Belgium, the Netherlands, and the Scandinavian countries, but was unable to invade England. After Russia seized certain territory in the Balkans without prior consultation, Hitler imagined that Stalin was conspiring with Great Britain against Germany. Therefore, he turned on Stalin and invaded Russia, where, like Napoleon, he met eventual defeat after conquering most of western Russia.

In the meantime, the United States, under the neutrality acts of 1935/7, attempted for awhile to remain truly neutral, in order to avoid repetition of its mistake in entering World War I. But as the terrible difference in German objectives in World War II soon became apparent to all, the neutrality acts were rescinded and the United States became more and more unneutral, until it was providing huge materiel aid to England and Russia, largely without compensation, and was re-arming itself to enter the war against Germany. Immediately after the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor, Germany declared war on the United States. Again, even more decisively than in World War I, the United States participation in the conflict this time brought about the complete defeat of Germany and Italy in 1945, while at the same time defeating Japan almost single-handed.

World War II was much more brutal and uncivilized than World War I, with the bombing from the air by both sides of enemy industrial cities, with thousands of civilian casualties as well as immense property destruction, including homes and historical and art treasures as well as industrial objectives. And the Germans, in occupied areas, herded Jews and sometimes other so-called "lesser races" into concentration camps, where they were starved, maltreated, and murdered. The Russians and Poles retaliated in kind to some degree. There has been universal condemnation of such barbaric treatment of minorities and enemies, but not of bombing cities. Peoples of other nations have been ahead of people in the United States in asserting the immorality of bombing cities, especially in contemplation of the horrors of possible atomic destruction.

Following the end of World War II, Germany was divided into four parts for occupation by the Allied powers, while peace terms were being determined leisurely. In 1948 it was found that Russia would not agree to any peace settlement with Germany, except on her own terms, and more recently it was found to be Russian policy to keep Germany divided indefinitely in order to prevent East Germany (its puppet state for the area occupied by it) from becoming a part of a strong united Germany, which would be most certainly an ally of the Western powers in the Cold War that had developed between them and Russia. Hence, it appears that the Federal Republic of Germany, on the West, and the German Democratic Republic, on the East, will exist apart indefinitely, and that there will be no specific peace settlement, since neither side desires to use force to settle the matter. Nevertheless, it is still the objective of both East and West Germany to be reunited, and this objective is supported by the United States. Unhappily, the terms of the peace settlement by the Allies with Austria forbids reunification with Germany, even if it is mutually desired. Austria is not only German, but her lack of economic self-sufficiency makes it desirable that she be united with Germany. The ultimate consequences of preventing German unification are unknown. Past experience would suggest that it may be unhealthy for Russia, and possibly also for civilization.

Immediately after the war, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and Hungary were also restored, except for that part of Poland which Russia annexed. Russia supported Poland's claim for all German territory east of the northern Oder and Neisse Rivers (including Eastern Pomerania, East Prussia, and Western Silesia, which were German states for centuries, even after World War I). Accordingly, the Oder-Neisse line became the boundary between Poland and East Germany, and about ten million Germans east of the line were moved by Russia and Poland to German territory west of the line - - one of the greatest mass migrations in history. West Germany does not accept the Oder-Neisse line, and the United States is not committed to it. The boundary between West Germany and France is about the same as after World War I. The German states of Alsace and Lorraine have been a part of France since the end of World War I. Although no plebiscites were ever conducted in either of those states, it is understood that their inhabitants are now satisfied to be in French provinces.

West Germany comprises about 70% of the total area of present East and West Germany, and contains about 78% of the total population of approximately 76 millions. While both parts of Germany have recovered economically, their combined industrial production is now surpassed by Russia. However, the per-capita income in West Germany is almost twice that in Russia, although about the same as that in Great Britain and France. Life in the truly democratic West Germany is more appealing than in the communist, totalitarian East. Consequently, emigration to the West is prohibited in the East, in order to avoid the population loss, but this has not prevented the escape of thousands.

The United States contributed greatly to the rehabilitation of West Germany (as well as the rest of Western Europe) by aid under the Marshall Plan and by subsequent loans and credits. Such aid greatly exceeded the value of industrial machinery and equipment taken from West Germany and given to Russia, as reparations, immediately after the war. No other reparations payments were demanded. The United States armed forces, with their nuclear power, also provide a shield for the protection of West Germany from Russia. The West German armed forces are an integral part of the total NATO forces in Germany.

West Germany is a member of the European Coal and Steel Community and the European Economic Community (Common Market), the purposes of which are to eliminate all trade barriers between the Western-European member-nations. Originally EEC was also planned to be a medium for ultimate political unification of its members - - a goal still supported by West Germany, but not by France, whose dictator, General Charles de Gaulle, wants to see Europe dominated by France. He dreams of past French Grandeur (glory) in the days of Louis XIV and Napoleon.

The present government of West Germany gives promise that it is learning how to function properly as a democracy, and that the leaders of the principal conflicting political parties are learning the true nature of the politicians' art, which is to resolve, or at least to compromise, conflicting interests, and to protect the basic rights of minorities, without resort to dictatorship or force. This lesson has not yet been learned well by any European nation, except Great Britain, Switzerland, the Netherlands, the Scandinavian countries, and possibly Belgium and Finland.

RESEARCH METHODS AND SOURCES OF DATA

Soon after beginning this undertaking, it was decided to attempt to list in this work the names, parentage, and other pertinent genealogical facts concerning all descendants of Balser Bortner, living and dead, who carry or carried the name "Bordner", and all of their preceding Bortner ancestors in America. The same principle was later extended to the related descendants of Balser Bortner who carry or carried the name "Burtner". It was decided that no effort would be made to trace the descendants of Bordner and Burtner daughters, whose names, of course, are different, because the effort involved would be staggering in magnitude and no high-degree of completeness of results of such an effort could be expected. The high-degree of achievement of the goal set has been pleasantly surprising.

The development of the genealogical data for the Bordner and Burtner families was a process which combined search of published records with solicitation of data from living Bordners and Burtners all over the United States.

The Library of Congress was consulted first; it has a large genealogical section, and it has the most comprehensive collection of published books and magazines of any library in the United States. Especially valuable in this research were the following: the genealogy, "George Bortner of Codorus Township, York County, Pennsylvania, and his descendants"; "Pennsylvania German Pioneers", by Strassburger and Hinke; Archives of the Colony and the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; various county histories which contain genealogical data, especially for Berks and Northumberland Counties in Pennsylvania; the volumes of William H. Egle, "Notes and Queries, Historical and Genealogical, Relating to Pennsylvania"; certain of the few available early-Pennsylvania church and ministerial records on file there; and a few published genealogies for other families which contained data concerning members of those families who had intermarried with Bordners or Burtners.

The Pennsylvania Archives contain data from records of colonial military forces, including the Pennsylvania militia during the Revolutionary War; tax lists by county and township for the latter part of the 18th century; records of Warrants issued by the Colonial Proprietors (the Penns) for the purchase of land; and records of foreigners who were naturalized as British citizens prior to the Revolutionary War. These records were searched for all Bortners, Bordners, and Burtners, with the assistance of their complete indexes.

Translations of a number of old records from German cities and districts, listing emigrants from the Rhineland to America in the 18th century, were found in the Library of Congress, but no listing was found for Balser Bortner (which would have told us from where he came). Similarly no Bortner coat-of-arms was found in the comprehensive collection of German coats-of-arms, although information was found on the Pförtner family, possibly related in name, as previously stated.

Books and magazines in the Library of Congress also provided most of the resources for research on the historical background of Colonial Pennsylvania, the Pennsylvania Dutch, and the German homeland.

Many records in the National Archives were also examined; these provided extensive valuable information. Most important were the decennial census records of the United States from 1790 to 1880 (the last available to the public); these were searched laboriously for every county and township (or city) in which Bordners and Burntners and their Bortner ancestors were located at the time, or suspected of being located. Census schedules, commencing in 1850, list each person in each family by name and age, but census schedules prior thereto only list the heads of households and enumerate the males and females in each household by age group. U. S. military and pension records, available for all wars up to 1900, also provided much data on war veterans, their families, where they lived, etc. U. S. land records for Ohio were not helpful, because they disclosed no sales of public lands to Bordners or Burntners.

The library of the Historical Society of Berks County, Pennsylvania, in Reading, furnished valuable copies of records of Reformed and Lutheran churches in that county (baptisms and marriages). The Fackenthal library of Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster, Pennsylvania, provided similar early records of Reformed churches in other counties of southeastern Pennsylvania. Some similar records for Lutheran churches in southeastern Pennsylvania are maintained in a Lutheran Seminary in Philadelphia, but were not available for inspection.

The Pennsylvania State Library in Harrisburg contains a great deal of pertinent genealogical data, but most of it had already been examined in other places. However, information was found there from tombstones and church records from Cumberland County (the Zeamer Collection). Similarly, very little additional data was found in the library of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia.

The Pennsylvania Colonial records of land sales, maintained in the Bureau of Land Records, Department of Internal Affairs, in the Capitol Building in Harrisburg, provided much more information on land sales than was found in the published Archives of the Colony.

County public records were consulted in the court-houses of many counties in Pennsylvania, Ohio, northeastern Indiana, and southern Michigan - - records of marriages, Wills, estates, and such birth and death records as were available. Copies of deeds and divorce-case records were examined in some instances.

Examination of the lineage records of the members of the Daughters of the American Revolution provided limited but useful data concerning the ancestry of a few Bordners.

Tombstones and grave-markers in church and public cemeteries were searched for in some places, mainly as a last resort, because that is very time-consuming - - and then principally in those areas which were visited for examination of county records. In such instances, to the extent possible, cemetery records were examined to eliminate the excessive time involved in systematically cruising through entire cemeteries. In the case of York County, Pennsylvania, tombstone inscriptions from most of the county's cemeteries, up to about 1935, were found in the library of the county historical society.

Telephone directories were searched for names and addresses of Bordners and Burntners listed, not only for the areas visited in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan, but also for all the major cities of the United States, in the library of telephone directories maintained by the telephone company in Washington, D. C., and for many smaller communities in which Bordners and Burntners were known to have been once located (which directories were procured by special order through the Washington telephone company). All such Bordners and Burntners were circularized, requesting data for their families, and generally also for their fathers' families. In those letters, a promise was made to give each person who furnished data, an outline of his or her Bordner or Burtner lineage back to our mutual immigrant ancestor. Despite such promised compensation, first returns were disappointing; many did not reply. Follow-up letters were sent to those who did not reply, and in the areas later visited, personal calls and local phone-calls were made to obtain missing data. In a few localities, similar visits and phone calls were made by relatives in those areas. In a number of instances, as a last resort, long-distance phone-calls were made. Data obtained by all of these means provided additional names and addresses of other living Bordners and Burtners to write for information. Without such assistance, which is gratefully acknowledged, this work could not have been completed. In the end, very few adamantly refused to provide information.

There were difficulties in trying to connect the data provided through circularization of the living with data obtained from other sources - in some instances, the last-available data from other sources being that provided in the 1880 U.S. census schedules. Public records were useful in bridging the gap. For localities not personally visited, the county recorders and other appropriate local officials were written, with requests for specific information, but to the greatest possible extent, correspondence with descendants was used as the preferred means of obtaining connecting data. In some instances, correspondents kindly provided comprehensive data from family bibles, results of research by themselves or relatives for their respective branches of the family, or names and addresses of others who were able to provide such data; such assistance was especially helpful. Below are listed, with grateful appreciation, the names of those who provided exceptional assistance:

William T. Bordner and son, Raymond C., Myerstown, Pa. - Family of Thomas L. Bordner of Bethel, Pa. and descendants; also families of his ancestors in Bethel.

John D. Bordner, Hummelstown, Pa.; Harvey Bohn, Lickdale, Pa.; Gerald Boltz, Lebanon, Pa. - Families of many Lebanon County Bordners and their lineage.

Robert Bordner, Peninsula, Ohio - Families of Godfrey Bordner of Berks County, Pa. and John Bordner of Dauphin and Lebanon Counties, Pa., and of some of their descendants, including family of John H. Bordner of Zamboanga, Philippine Islands and his descendants.

Miss Gertrude L. Bordner, Saltsburg, Pa. - Family of Godfrey Bordner Jr. of Berks and Lebanon Counties, Pa. and his descendants.

Gerald H. Bordner, Paxtang, Pa.; C. E. Koppenheffer, Emporium, Pa.; William H. Bordner, Williamstown, Pa.; and Jacob J. Bordner, Jolliett, Pa. - Many families of Bordners in Dauphin Co., Pa.

Mrs. Esther Janing, Geneva, Nebr. and John F. Bordner, Northumberland, Pa. - Data for many families of Northumberland County Bordners (and Mrs. Janing for families of their Nebraska descendants).

Mrs. Gladys L. Simler, Cincinnati, Ohio - Data on first Bordner families in Ohio and family of Peter Bordner, the first of Dauphin County, Pa.

Miss Florence N. Bordner, North Canton, Ohio - Families of descendants of John P. Bordner and other Bordner families in Stark County and Tuscarawas County, Ohio.

Daniel E. Bordner, New Washington, Ohio - Families of Jacob Bordner of Crawford County, Ohio and some of his descendants.

Mr. and Mrs. Ray Magill, Holgate, Ohio - Data on various Bordners in Henry County, Ohio.

Mark H. Bordner, Wayne E. Bordner, Roy Bordner, and Mrs. Oscar (Clara) Bordner of Montpelier, Ohio, and McClellan N. Bordner of Metamora, Ohio - Various families of Bordners in Williams County, Ohio and their descendants.

William C. Bordner, San Francisco, Calif. - Descendants of Jonathan Bordner of De Kalb County, Ind.

Mrs. John S. Bordner, Madison, Wisc. - Families of Isaac Bordner and John Bordner of Elkhart County, Ind. and their descendants.

Mrs. Edna Albright, Jackson, Mich. - Families of Levi Bordner of Elkhart County, Ind. and his son, Samuel Bordner of Plymouth, Ind.

Martin Love, Lewistown, Ill. - Families of Peter Bordner of Lewistown, Ill. and his descendants.

Mrs. Blanche Jones, Stephenville, Tex. - Families of Texas descendants of Peter Bordner of Lewistown, Ill.

Mrs. Margaret Beemer, Bedford, Iowa - Families of Iowa descendants of Peter Bordner of Lewistown, Ill.

Terrance J. Bordner and Lawrence M. Bordner Jr., Freeport, Ill.; Mr. and Mrs. William G. Bordner, Dakota, Ill.; Charles L. Bordner Jr., Clinton, Wisc. - Families of Jacob and George Bordner of Stephenson County, Ill. and descendants.

Mrs. Alice Brummel, Long Beach, Calif. and Mrs. Helen McLaughlin, Highmore, S. D. - Families of Daniel M. Bordner of Stephenson County, Ill. and descendants.

James O. Bordner, Sweeny, Tex. - Family of George I. Bordner of Kansas and his descendants; also various other Bordner families in Kansas.

Dewey M. Brown and Mrs. Helen Shaw, Holton, Kans. - Families of Benjamin F. Bordner of Circleville, Kans. and his descendants.

Guy Bordner, Long Beach, Calif. - Families of William S. Bordner of Nebraska and California and his descendants; also other Bordner families in California.

Clare S. Burtner, Butler, Pa. - Families of Philip and John Bortner (Burtner) of Allegheny and Butler Counties, Pa. and their descendants.

Evers Burtner, Wakefield, Mass. - Families of Samuel Burtner of Cumberland County, Pa. and his descendants.

Mrs. Eunice March, Shawnee Mission, Kans. - Families of Reuben Burtner of Kansas and his descendants.

Miss Emma B. Burtner, Keedysville, Md. - Families of Rev. Henry Burtner of Dayton, Va. and his son, Ezra Burtner of Washington County, Md. and descendants.

Mr. and Mrs. William O. Burtner, Arlington and Harrisonburg, Va., and Roy H. Burtner Jr., Washington, D. C. - Families of descendants of Rev. Henry Burtner.

Mrs. Naomi Burtner Mulcahy, East Gary, Ind. - Genealogy for George Otterbein Burtner of Coles County, Ill. and his descendants (copy provided by courtesy of Clare S. Burtner, Butler, Pa.).

Mrs. Henrietta J. Jefferis, Indianapolis, Ind. - Mailing list of association of descendants of George Otterbein Burtner.

Mrs. Nona Forgason, Wharton, Tex., and her daughter, Mrs. Johnny Jean Clark, Pasadena, Tex. - Families of Jacob L. Burtner of Douglas County, Ill. and certain descendants.

Mr. and Mrs. Clarence C. Burtner, Oakland, Ill. - Families of Thomas J. Burtner of Douglas County, Ill. and Miles City, Mont. and certain descendants.

Mr. and Mrs. Orville L. Burtner, Kansas City, Kans. - Families of Charles J. Burtner of Kansas City, Kans. and descendants.

C. Walton Burtner, San Jose, Calif., and Mrs. Mildred Martin, Saratoga, Calif. - Families of Rev. John Burtner of Edgar County, Ill. and certain descendants.

Mrs. Hilda E. Bordner, Hershey, Pa. - Special acknowledgment for providing a print of the Bortner coat-of-arms originally distributed by The Bortner Association of York County, Pennsylvania.

EXPLANATION OF REGISTERS OF NAMES AND THEIR USE

The principal genealogical registers which follow are the registers of males and their families. These are subdivided into three parts: Part B for all known Bordner males, both living and dead, who are descended from Balser Bortner; Part C for all known Burtner males who are descended from Balser Bortner; and Part A, for Balser Bortner and all of his male descendants named "Bortner" who are also ancestors of either Bordner or Burtner males who are listed in Parts B and C. No other Bortner males are listed; those not listed are all descendants of George Bortner of Codorus Township, York County, Pennsylvania, for whom The Bortner Association published a genealogy in 1949.

In the registers of males and their families, males are listed in alphabetical order of given names; those who have the same given name are listed in order of birthdates. For each male the following facts are given, to the extent known:

- Number of generation (counting Balser Bortner as the first generation, his sons as the second generation; their sons as the third generation, etc.)
- Name of father and maiden name of mother
- Maiden name of each wife
- Years of birth and death of husband and wife (or wives)
- Where the family live (or lived)
- His occupation
- Military service in time of war
- Given names of children for each marriage
- In the case of daughters, the family names of their husbands

For dates of birth of children and other information regarding them, one should refer to their individual listings in the registers. For example, all male children, including infants, are listed individually in the male registers, as well as adult males.

Females are listed in two separate registers: Part D for Bordners, and Part E for Burtners. Each known female is listed, including unmarried women and children. The listing is also, first in alphabetical order of given name, and second, for those having the same given name, in order of birthdates. Information is similar to that given for each male up to the time of marriage, when they changed their names. To the extent known, each of their husbands is named, and if living, their locations are given; if deceased, the last known place of residence is stated. Their childrens' names are not given, nor are they listed in the registers of males and females, except for the few offspring who carry the Bordner or Burtner name, rather than their fathers' names (cases of resumption of maiden name by mother after divorce, and cases of children born out of wedlock). For those who are deceased, the years of death are not given; generally those dates were not ascertained.

The data in these registers were compiled over a period of about five years in the case of Bordners, and two years in the case of Burtners. Changes in data initially obtained, to make the data more current, were recorded only when the information was subsequently reported. Hence, the data will be slightly out-of-date in many cases at the time of publication of this genealogy; and in some cases, the data will be a little more current than in other cases.

One may trace his Bordner-Bortner lineage, or Burtner-Bortner lineage, back to our mutual immigrant ancestor, Balser Bortner, primarily by use of the registers of males and their families. This may be done by going backwards in a step-by-step reference to the father of each one in the chain. When one reaches the ancestor who first was known by the Bordner or Burtner name, he must then trace that ancestor's father, grandfather, etc. back through the register of Bortner males (Part A). One's lineage will have as many steps as the number of his own generation. An example follows, using as the starting point, Thomas L. Bordner of Bethel Township, Berks County, Pennsylvania; he was the grandfather of many living Bordners:

First, look up Thomas L. Bordner in Part B of the registers. It is shown there that he was of the 5th generation, and that his parents were Jacob Bordner and Catharine Lerch. Second, look up, in Part B of the registers, Jacob Bordner of the 4th generation who married Catharine Lerch. There we note, that he did have a son, Thomas L., and hence we can be sure that we are on the right track. Then note that his father, in turn, was also named Jacob Bordner and his mother's maiden name was Anna Maria Brosz. Third, look up in Part B of the registers, Jacob Bordner of the third generation who married Anna Maria Brosz. There we note that they did have a son, Jacob. Then note that his father, in turn, was also named Jacob Bordner and his mother's maiden name was Sarah Balt. Fourth, look up in Part B of the registers, Jacob Bordner of the 2nd generation who married Sarah Balt. There we note that they had a son named Jacob. Then we also note that his father, in turn, was Balser Bortner, and that Jacob was the first in his line to adopt the name "Bordner". For the fifth and last step, look up Balser Bortner, this time in Part A of the registers, because his name was Bortner. Then we may list the Bortner-Bordner lineage of Thomas L. Bordner from the beginning, thus:

1. Balser Bortner (c1698 - 1747/8) - m. Maria Elisabetha _____ (c1695 - c1750)
2. Jacob Bortner (Bordner) (c1720 - 1792) - m. Sarah Balt (? - ?)
3. Jacob Bordner (1754 - 1837) - m. Anna Maria Brosz (1761 - 1839)
4. Jacob Bordner (1793 - 1867) - m. Catharine Lerch (1793 - 1868)
5. Thomas L. Bordner (1824 - 1899) - m. Melinda Schneider (1830 - 1915)

And this may be brought right on down to the person who undertook to find his lineage in this example.

At each step in looking up one's ancestors, generation by generation, one may find further information concerning them and their respective families; then one may also continue to find data for uncles, aunts, and cousins in the registers.

For the additional assistance of many in finding information in the registers, an index is provided of the names of those men and women from other families who married Bordners, Burtners, and their Bortner ancestors. The index is alphabetical - - first by family name, and second by given name. In each case, there is given the name of the Bortner, Bordner, or Burtner who she or he married; and with that name, one may find further information in the appropriate register.

Despite extreme care and patience in research and in compiling this work, errors may be found in the registers, primarily in spelling names, omitting persons not discovered, and omitting names of undisclosed husbands and wives. To the extent any error was avoidable, an apology is made. However, it is believed that most errors are attributable to failure of informants to disclose complete and accurate information.

REGISTER OF MALES AND THEIR FAMILIES

PART A - BORTNER ANCESTORS

Number preceding name indicates generation, counting Balser Bortner as first generation, his children as second generation, their children as third generation, etc.

Refer to Part B for Bordner males and Part C for Burtner males (and their families).

1. Balser (Balthaser) Bortner (cl698-1747/8) - m. Maria Elisabetha _____ (cl695-cl750)
Farmer in the Tulpehocken Settlement in Lancaster Co., Pa. (part in Western part of Berks Co. after 1752). Arrived in Philadelphia in September, 1732 on Ship, "Adventure", from Rotterdam, Holland. Came from one of German States in the Rhine River Valley, probably the Palatinate. Common ancestors of almost all of the Bortners, Bordners, and Burtners in the United States. Children: Born in the Old Country: Jacob (Bordner), Anna Maria Barbara (Mrs. Henry Kann), and perhaps, George (although he might have been born in the Tulpehocken Settlement). Born in the Pennsylvania Colony: Peter, Philip Jacob, Phillipina (Mrs. Charles Shaffer, Mrs. Frederick Frasher), (Maria) Elisabetha (Betsey - Mrs. Michael Lau or Low).
2. George (cl732 - cl801) - m. Maria Appalonia Floucher (? - ?)
Son of Balser and Maria Elisabetha Bortner. Possibly born in the Old Country; possibly in the Pennsylvania Colony. Raised in the Tulpehocken Settlement in Lancaster Co., Pa. (part in Western part of Berks Co. after 1752). Farmer in Codorus Twp., York Co., Pa. after 1759. In Pennsylvania militia during the Revolutionary War. Children: Julia, Christina (Mrs. Abraham Hassler), George Jr., Ludwig, Catharine, Elizabeth, Philip, John, Peter, Margaret, Jacob, and Michael. Only John and Peter had any descendants named "Bordner" or "Burtner". All descendants of other sons who bore family name were named "Bortner". *
3. Jacob (cl755 - 1815) - m. (1) Susanna (Meyer ?)(cl755 - cl780); (2) Eva _____ (cl760 - cl820). Probably son of Peter Bortner. Farmer in Warwick Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa. until at least 1782, and later in East Pennsborough Twp. (part now in Silver Spring Twp.), Cumberland Co., Pa. In Pennsylvania militia during Revolutionary War. Children: (1) George (Burtner), Jacob (Bordner); (2) Samuel (Burtner). Also two daughters: Elizabeth (Mrs. Philip Bretz), Barbara (Mrs. Walter Linn) - - which marriage is unknown.
4. Jacob (1795 - ?) - m. (1) Susanna Schneider (?); (2) Name unknown; (3) Ann Hess.
Son of John Bortner and Juliana Gantz. Farmer in Hopewell Twp., York Co., Pa. Children: Josiah, Jacob Schneider, John (probably all in first marriage); perhaps others, names unknown. Only John changed his name ("Bordner"). All descendants of other sons who bore family name were named "Bortner". *
3. John (1768 - 1859) - m. Juliana Gantz (cl756 - 1824)
Son of George Bortner and Maria Appalonia Floucher. Born in Codorus Twp., York Co., Pa. Farmer in Hopewell Twp., York Co., Pa. Children: Jane (Mrs. Robert Hyson), John, Elizabeth (Mrs. John Fife), Jacob, Salome (Mrs. _____ Yost), Peter, Jesse. Only Jacob had any descendants named "Bordner". All descendants of other sons who bore family name were named "Bortner". *

REGISTER OF MALES AND THEIR FAMILIES

PART A - BORTNER ANCESTORS (CONTINUED)

2. Peter (c1734 - ?) - m. Name unknown
Son of Balser Bortner and Maria Elisabetha Bortner. Farmer in Heidelberg Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa. until at least 1760. Probably died young, Probable son, Jacob.
3. Peter (1770 - 1832) - m. Elizabeth Wayne (1774 - 1855)
Son of George Bortner and Maria Appalonia Floucher. Farmer in Codorus Twp., York Co., Pa. until at least 1801, when he moved to Franklin Twp., York Co. Children: George, Peter Jr., Christina, Catharine, John, Martin, William, Elizabeth (Betsey). Children generally known as "Burtner", although not all of them actually changed their name. (See Part C.) *
2. Philip Jacob (c1735 - 1786) - m. Elizabeth (Maria Elisabetha) Velt (1741 - c1800)
Son of Balser and Maria Elisabetha Bortner. Farmer in Bethel Twp., Berks Co., Pa. until about 1779 when he moved with his family to Pine Grove Twp., Berks Co. (now in Schuylkill Co.). In Pennsylvania militia during Revolutionary War. Surviving children: Henry (Bordner), George (Bordner), John (Burtner), Philip (Burtner), Elizabeth, Hannah (Mrs. Adam Bingeman ?), Juliana, Balser (Balthaser - Bordner), Magdalena (Mrs. Adam Kembel ?), and Christina (Mrs. John Neis or Ney ?).

*Most of the data for this family from "George Bortner of Codorus Township, York County, Pennsylvania, and his descendants", prepared by Charles H. Glatfelter, and published by The Bortner Association, Glen Rock, Pa. (1949). Reference is made to that work for data on all of his other descendants named "Bortner".

- - - - -

Note: Not all males who were generally known as "Bordner " or "Burtner", as indicated above, actually so changed their names, but their sons or grandsons made the change. Nevertheless, they and their families are listed in Parts B and C, respectively, for convenience. The true facts, so far as ascertainable, with respect to such name changes, are stated for each male and his family.
